

THE ROMAN HISTORY,

From the Restitution of the

EMPIRE

BY

Charles the Great,

To the Taking of

Constantinople by the Turks.

Containing the Space of 653 Years.

V O L. V. and Last.

By the Author of the Third and Fourth.

The THIRD EDITION.

Revis'd by JAMES HENRY BAKER, A. M. Being a further Continuation of his History.

L O N D O N

9138

Printed for R. Bonwicke, J. Tonson, W. Freeman, Tim. Goodwin, J. Walthoe, M. Wotton, B. Tooke, J. Nicholson, R. Parker, S. Manship, and R. Smith.

MDCCLXII

10-2-18

177

10-2-18

10-2-18

---

---

T H E

P R E F A C E.

A T length the Reader is presented with the Fifth and Last Volume, of what we call the Roman History, which concludes with the Dissolution of the Byzantine, or Eastern Empire, the fatal Effects of which all Christendom feels to this Day. I thought the kind Reception the World gave the former Volumes, a sufficient Encouragement for me to undergo the Difficulties I knew I had to contend with in the compiling of this, tho' I must confess they prov'd greater upon Trial, than they at first appear'd. The multiplicity of Authors I had to consult, their different Tempers, private Interest and Inclinations; the Prolixness of some, and affected Brevity of others, their manifest Contradictions, and the different Opinions they have severally met with from the learned World, convinc'd me of the great Care I was to take in the Performance, and how liable I was to Mistakes. 'Tis a just Observation Cantacuzenus, one of the best among 'em, has made himself in the Preface to his History, 'Αυτοὶ δὲ ὅπως ποτὲ ἔτυχον διακείμενοι περὶ ὧν διελέγοντο, εὖτε δὴ καὶ τὸ διήγησιν ἀπέδωκαν τῆς πραγματίας, ἀρκεῖν αὐτοῖς ἠγάγετο

A

The P R E F A C E.

ἡγέμενοι πρὸς Ἀντιμαχίαν τῶν πόνων, ἢ τὸ φιλέμενον
ἐπαινέσαι, ἢ τὸ μισέμενον καθυβρίσαι, τὸ δ' ἀληθείας μὴδὲν φροντίσαντες. They represented, saieth he,
the Matters they pretended to give an Historical Account of, in such Colours as were most agreeable to their particular Tempers; without any Regard had to Truth, they thought their Business was immoderately to praise or condemn those to whom, upon private Confiderations, they were well or ill affected. For this Reason I found it my Business to enquire into the History of the Man, before I could depend upon that of the Author, and quickly perceiv'd, that Prejudice and Partiality were Vices, as Predo- minant in those Ages as they are now; even they who pretended to be Eye-Witnesses of what they writ, were often blinded by Passion, or missled by Interest.

I would premise this, by way of Apology, for whatever Errors shall be found in the following Sheets: The Ground was so slippery that I hope I may be pardon'd, if I have tripp'd sometimes; when the Foundation is weak, 'tis unreasonable to expect
a Master-piece in the Superstructure.

After all I hope it is not so bad, but the Read- er will meet with something in it worthy his Ob- servation, and perceive it's no new thing to hear the People cry out, The Temple of the Lord,
the Temple of the Lord! who very rarely fre- quent the Church, or to find Men contend for what they call the Purity of Worship, who in the mean time place all in a specious Outside, and having

having no more than the Form of Godliness, are no better than tinkling Cymbals. One thing the Reader will particularly observe of the Greeks, that when Mahomet was with a powerful Army at their Gates, and the Dangers, with which they were immediately threaten'd, requir'd the united Forces of a much stronger People to oppose 'em, that then they busied themselves in unseasonable Disputes about Religion, 'till they had sacrific'd even that, and all that was dear to 'em, in the Quarrel.

The Reader perhaps may wonder why 'tis still call'd the Roman History, since the People of whom it treats bear so little a Resemblance to those Ancient Romans, who were the Subject of the former Volumes : The greatest Reason is, that they always call themselves so ; their Authors call'd the People Romans, and their Princes the Roman Emperors, affecting the Title when they had lost the Power, and so were laugh'd at by the rest of the World for their Pains.

In a Word, tho' it be not a Work so perfect and irreprovable, as might be wish'd, yet I hope it will not meet with a worse Reception, for the many Pamphlets that abound at this Day in the World, which oftner expose the Heat, than the Sense of a Party, and serve only to widen the Breaches they pretend to heal. 'Tis the Sign of an ill Management in the Faculty, when so many set up for Physicians ; and certainly we never had more Pretenders to Politicks, who less understood the Thing they

The PREFACE.

they presume to teach; and 'tis well if some Means could be found to draw the World off from reading and encouraging such Follies.

I hope the Errors of the Press (except some few that occur in the Margin) are so inconsiderable, that it will be needless to give the Reader the Trouble of an Errata, only he is desir'd to read Conqueror instead of Emperor, when he comes to the twenty fourth Line of the ninety second Page.

---

---

A

T A B L E

O F T H E

E M P E R O R S.

A	Alexander , 81st Emp. Page 65 to 67
	Alexius , 97th Emp. p. 210 to 261
	Alexius II. 100th Emp. p. 289 to 296
	Alexius Angelus , 103d Emp. p. 314 to 325
	Alexius Angelus II. 104th Emp. p. 325 to 330
	Andronicus , 101st Emp. p. 296 to 301
	Andronicus II. 109th Emp. p. 367 to 390
	Andronicus III. 110th Emp. p. 390 to 396
	Basilus , 79th Emp. p. 48 to 54
	Basilus II. 85th Emp. p. 116 to 139
	Calo-Joannes , 98th Emp. p. 261 to 269
	Constantine VI. 81. Emp. p. 67 to 88
	Constantine VII. 85th Emp. p. 116 to 141
	Constantinus Monomachus , 89th Emp. p. 160 to 177
	Constantinus Ducas , 93d Emp. p. 186 to 190
	Constant. Palæologus , 114th Emp. p. 415 ad fin.
	John Ducas , 106th Emp. p. 342 to 350
	John Palæologus , 111th Emp. p. 396 to 408
	John VI. 113th Emp. p. 413 to 415
	Irene , 72d Emp. p. 1 to 5

A Table of the Emperors.

Isaac Comnenus, 92d Emp. p. 180 to 186
Isaacius Angelus, 102d Emp. p. 301 to 314
Leo IV. 75th Emp. p. 15 to 21
Leo V. 80th Emp. p. 54 to 64
Manuel Comnenus, 99th Emp. p. 269 to 289
Manuel Palæologus, 112th Emp. p. 408 to 413
Michael I. 74th Emp. p. 12 to 15
Michael II. 76th Emp. p. 21 to 31
Michael III. 78th Emp. p. 40 to 48
Michael IV. 87th Emp. p. 149 to 157
Michael V. 88th Emp. p. 157 to 160
Michael VI. 91st Emp. p. 178 to 180
Michael Ducas, 95th Emp. p. 197 to 202
Nicephorus I. 73d Emp. p. 5 to 11
Nicephorus II. 83d Emp. p. 92 to 99
Nicephorus III. 96th Emp. p. 202 to 210
Palæologus, 108th Emp. p. 353 to 367
Romanus I. 82d Emp. p. 88 to 92
Romanus II. 86th Emp. p. 141 to 149
Romanus III. 94th Emp. p. 190 to 197
Theodora, 90th Emp. p. 177 to 178
Theodorus Lascaris I. 105th Emp. p. 334 to 342
Theod. Lascaris II. 107th Emp. p. 351 to 353
Theophilus, 77th Emp. p. 31 to 40
Zimisce, 84th Emp. p. 99 to 116

---

THE CONTENTS.

---

VOL. V.

FROM the Restitution of the Roman Empire
by Charles the Great, to the Taking of Constantinople by the Turks; Containing the Space of 653 Years.

CHAP. I.

From the Re-establishment of the Empire in the West, to the Death of Leo Philosophus; Containing the Space of 111 Years. Page 1.

CHAP. II.

From the Death of Leo the Philosopher to that of Basilus II. who subdu'd the Bulgarians, and made 'em Tributary to the Empire; Containing the Space of 114 Years.

p. 65
CHAP.

The CONTENTS.

CHAP. III.

From the Death of Basilus, to the Reign of Alexius Comnenus, in whose Time the Western Christians first undertook their Expedition into the Holy Land; Containing the Space of 56 Years. p. 139

CHAP. IV.

From the Beginning of Alexius his Reign, 'till the Western Christians expell'd the Greeks out of Constantinople; Containing the Space of 119 Years. p. 214

CHAP. V.

From the Expulsion of the Greek Emperors out of Constantinople, 'till their Restoration; Containing the Space of 60 Years. p. 334

CHAP. VI.

From the Restitution of the Empire to the Greeks 'till the Total Subjection of it by the Turks under Mahomet the Great; Containing the Space of 193 Years. p. 360

---

T H E
Roman History.

---

V O L. V.

---

From the Restitution of the Roman Empire by Charles the Great, to the Taking of Constantinople by the Turks.

Containing the Space of 653 Years.

---

C H A P. I.

From the Re-establishment of the Empire in the West, to the Death of Leo Philosophus.

Containing the Space of 111 Years.

I. THE last Volume concluded with the Re-establishment of the Empire in the West under Charles the Great; and tho' the exceeding Power, and Authority of this new Empire, the Extent of its Dominions, the Intrigues, Interests, and different Fortunes of his Successors, the prevailing Greatness of the Popes, their private Artifices and publick Encroachments, the Ignorance of some, the Cruelty of others, and the Ambition of 'em all, seem to afford Materials more than sufficient for this succeeding Volume, I shall no farther regard 'em than as they bear a Relation to the Affairs of the East :

B

The

The Fortunes of which Empire I shall endeavour to pursue down to its Dissolution, and present 'em to the Reader's View, in as clear and methodical a Narration as the Assistance left us by the Historians will admit of.

The Byzantine Empire was so far from being weakened by the Erection of a new Imperial Authority in the West, that in all probability it would have receiv'd new Strength and Nourishment from it, as by a Line of Communication, had it not been broken by the Contrivances of some, who either preferr'd their private Interest to the publick Good, or were influenc'd by such narrow Considerations as confin'd their Councils and Actions to the Age they themselves liv'd in, without any Prospect had towards the Times that were to follow. Men began to grow too opinionative Statesmen, to be true Patriots, and the Art of Government was more aim'd at, than the End of it : However, as private Men are instructed by the Failings and Misfortunes of their Neighbours, so should the Factions and Distempers of one Age be apply'd to heal the Breaches and Divisions of another.

At the Time that Charles the Great was saluted Emperor by the Pope and all the Roman People, the Eastern Empire was engag'd in almost uninterrupted Wars with the Saracens, their irreconcilable Enemies; who, besides the Hatred they bore 'em from Considerations Civil and Political, persecuted them upon the Score of their Religion. Aaron their Caliph, and his Predecessors, had so effectually prevail'd against 'em, that hardly the Name of a Patriarch was heard of at Antioch or Alexandria; and that either because no such had been for some Time appointed, or for that they who were chosen to the Office had not the Courage, in that miserable Age, to appear in the Execution of it; and 'tis an assured Sign they have lost their Liberties, who have been forc'd to give up their Religion. These Considerations, and the daily Progress of Charles's Arms in the West, his unwearied Diligence, and warlike Preparations, which seem'd to promise him the absolute Dominion of all Italy, and of Sicily, mov'd Irene the Empress to send her Ambassadors to him with Proposals of a firm and lasting Peace. Charles gave 'em a very free and generous Audience, and promis'd by Ambassadors of his own at Constantinople to treat of, and agree to whatever should be thought proper for the Good of both Empires. To these Ambassadors were join'd Legats from the Pope, and they were all honour'd with a very magnificent Reception at Constantinople. Thus far the Matter proceeded much to the Honour and Satisfaction of Irene, tho' in the Issue it prov'd her Dethronement and Destruction. Among their other Instructions, these Ambassadors were order'd to treat of a Marriage between Charles and the Empress, that the two Empires might be once more happily united in their Persons. Of this Irene is said to have made the first Overtures to Charles, and therefore very readily enter'd into the Negotiations; but was as zealously oppos'd in it by Etius an Eunuch, who being a distinguish'd Favourite, rul'd with great Authority in the Palace, and was become Master of immense Treasures. He had for a long Time labour'd in secret to advance his Brother Leo, either as an Associate to Irene, or her Successor in the Empire, and he well knew all his Counsels and Contrivances would unavoidably be defeated by so unexpected a Treaty. Nor was Etius the only Obstacle to the Match propos'd, for Nicephorus the Patrician, a Man of great Interest and ambitious Designs, declar'd himself more openly against her. He had some Months before engag'd Nicetas and several others of the leading Men among the Patricians to join with him, by representing to 'em how shameful and ignominious it was for Men like them to be Slaves to the Pride and Ambition of an imperious Woman; and now added fresh Weight to his former Remonstrances, by showing 'em the dangerous Consequences of such a Match, and the pernicious Design Irene had of transferring the Government of the East into the Hands of Charles, and thereby making them no other than a Province to the Western Emperors. This produc'd a very sudden Revolution, for the discontented Nobility being supported by their Clients and Dependants, went in a large Body to the great Palace, where they got an easie Admittance; for telling the Guards it was Irene's Pleasure Nicephorus should be declar'd Emperor, on purpose to obviate the Designs of Ætius, who in a very presumptuous manner urg'd her to his Brother Leo's Promotion; Ætius being a Man obnoxious to the Army, the Guards readily believ'd what the Conspirators affirm'd, and declar'd for Nicephorus; who being thus admitted with his Friends, sent his Emissaries about the City that Night, to prepare the People for the Execution of his Designs the Day following. As soon as it was Light, those of his Party seiz'd forcibly on Irene, and shut her up in Prison; after which they conducted their new Emperor to the great Church, where he was crown'd in a tumultuous manner, being saluted with the Curses, rather than the Acclamations of the People.

Irene de-
pos'd.

And ba-
nish'd.

This was the end of Irene's Power, and the beginning of her Miseries. At first the Tyrant treated her with much Civility and Respect, he exclaim'd against the Violence of the People, who, out of a Disaffection to her Person and Government, had forc'd him to accept of the Imperial Title. He knew she had conceal'd an immense Treasure, and being a Man of a sordid covetous Temper he hop'd, by an insinuating Complacency, to persuade her to discover it. At first she endeavour'd to evade his Sollicitations, but at length comply'd with his Request, upon Condition she might be suffer'd to live in a peaceable and honourable Restraint in the Palace of Eleutherius, which she her self had built. Nicephorus, by a solemn Promise, granted her Desire, but having obtain'd his Ends he banish'd her to a Monastery in the Prince's Islands, from whence he shortly after remov'd her to

Mitylene

Mitylene in the Isle of Lesbos, left the People, who hated him, should restore her to her former Dignity, where she dy'd of Grief.

Tho' Irene had from the beginning behav'd her self like an arrogant, haughty, and ambitious Princess, yet the People, whom she had oblig'd by several popular Acts of Grace and Condescension, with unfeigned Sighs lamented her Destruction, and 'tis wonderful to consider how the great Champions of the Papacy extol and admire her upon no other Account but for her Devotion to the See of Rome, and her blind Zeal for the worship of Images; and tho' neither the Tongue of Men or Angels can reasonably excuse her unnatural Barbarity to her Son, they have prophanelly presum'd to vindicate it by Texts of Holy Scripture, and thereby in some measure made God himself, who is of purer Eyes than to behold Iniquity, the Author of an Act which all Ages must have in Execration; so ready are they, by a superstitious Logic, to join the greatest Opposites, and turn Darkness into Light.

Tho' Charles his Ambassadors, who were Eye-witnesses of this unexpected Revolution, could not but resent these rebellious Proceedings, yet they readily made their Court to the new Prince, and continu'd their Negotiations. Nicephorus, who well knew how great a Support the Friendship of Charles would prove to him, entertain'd 'em very favourably, and promis'd to send 'em back with Ambassadors of his own, who
the Year following concluded a Peace between the two Princes, by virtue of which Charles was acknowledg'd Emperor of the West, and his Empire comprehended all Italy, as far as the Rivers Volturno and Ol-phanto, with Bavaria, Hungary, Austria, Croatia, Dalmatia, Sclavonia, all Germany, France and Spain, and that the rest of Italy, except Venice and its Dependancies, which continu'd neuter, with the Eastern Parts of Europe, should continue under the Dominion of Nicephorus; whose Ambassadors, having had all Things

Nicepho-
rus.
A. D.
802.

transacted according to their own Desires, return'd home very well satisfy'd with their Negotiation.

Tho' Nicephorus hop'd, upon his Friendship with Charles, and the Benefit of this Treaty, to render himself belov'd and respected by his People, yet was he universally detested, especially by the Army. He was by Nature haughty, covetous and revengeful, which in some measure he conceal'd before his Promotion, but behav'd himself with little or no Reserve after his Advancement. It is to be doubted whether he was more greedy of Blood or of Gold : He was a perfect Slave to his Appetites, and as such could have no serious Taste of Religion. These pernicious Qualities, so unbecoming an Emperor in the very Entrance of his Reign, rais'd the general Murmurs of the People against him, and provok'd the Army in the East to renounce their Allegiance, and declare Bardanes, one of their Commanders, Emperor. Bardanes was at first supported by Michael and Leo, two principal Officers, who succeeded Nicephorus in the Empire; but whether they found Bardanes, who fear'd the Effusion of Christian Blood, averse to the Election of the Army; or that being of a meek, peaceable Temper, he was unable to improve the Advantage Fortune had thrown into his Hands, they shortly after deserted him, and went over to Nicephorus; so that Bardanes, being forsaken by his Friends, and terrify'd by the Predictions of a Monk, sent a submissive Message to Nicephorus, and earnestly su'd for a Pardon, which the Emperor readily promis'd, and order'd him to be shaven in the Monastery of Heraclius at Catabolium; but as if all this was not sufficient for his Security, he shortly after commanded his Eyes to be pluck'd out, as he was going upon a friendly Invitation from him to Constantinople. Nicephorus proceeded with great Severity against some others that had appear'd most forward in the late Commotions, and Nicetas, who had been so zealous for his Advancement, was poison'd about the same Time, and some will have it by the Emperor's

Bardanes
declar'd
Emperor
by the Army in the East.

A. D.
803.

Emperor's Order ; who being thus secur'd from Bardanes, thought farther to confirm the Empire in his own House by crowning his Son Stauratius, a Person as unfit for the Imperial Dignity as his Father, being de-form'd in Body and Mind. This Solemnity being over, and having, as he thought, settled his Affairs at home, he march'd with a powerful Army against the Arabians, who had miserably harra's'd the Empire, and from whom he receiv'd a total Defeat the August
 following, and very narrowly escap'd with his Life ;
 but the Saracens not thinking it sufficient that they had repell'd Nicephorus, and, after he had lost the greatest part of his Army, forc'd him to return inglorious home, shortly after, under the Command of Aaron
 their Caliph, to the Number of three hundred thousand Men, invaded the Empire, and proceeding as far as Tyana, the Metropolis of Cappadocia Minor, they took the City, and erected in it a Mahometan Mosch,
 after which the Caliph seiz'd on other fortify'd Towns,
 and having detach'd a Body of sixty thousand Men towards Ancyra in Galatia, they wasted the Country up as far as that City. This speedy Progress of the Infidels awaken'd Nicephorus, who was busying himself in Buildings, and other expensive Amusements. He rais'd as powerful an Army as the Time would allow of, but finding himself unable to resist the numerous Forces of his Enemies, he sent his Ambassadors to A- aron with Proposals for a Peace. The Caliph, who well knew the Necessities to which the Emperor was reduc'd, would give no ear to an Accommodation, but upon these Terms, that the Emperor should pay the Saracens an early Tribute of thirty thousand Pieces of Gold, besides three thousand for his own Head, and as many for that of his Son ; and that Nicephorus should not for the future presume to repair the Forts Aaron
 had taken and dismantl'd. Nicephorus paid the Money, but as soon as Aaron was retir'd he restor'd the Forts that had been demolish'd, and added new ones to 'em, at which the Arabians were so provok'd, that they return'd

Nicepho-
rus over- thrown by
the Ara-
bians.

A. D.
806.

The great Progress of the Sara-
cens.

Baron.
Annal.
A. D.
807.

return'd with a numerous Army, and rag'd with a greater Fury than they had done before. At the same Time they arm'd a strong Fleet against Cyprus, which they took, demolishing the Churches, killing or driving away the Inhabitants, and miserably wasting the Island. The Year following they attempted the same Thing against Rhodes, where a great Number of the Inhabitants were taken Prisoners ; but the Garrison in the Castle made a very vigorous Resistance, and the Fleet in their return suffer'd very much by a furious Storm, which some Writers have attributed to the Violence they offer'd the Relicks of St. Nicholas at Myra, a City in Lycia, where they touch'd as they were returning home.

In the mean Time Nicephorus was employ'd in seeking out an agreeable Match for his Son Stauratius; he had lately arm'd for an Expedition against the Bulgarians, his inveterate Enemies, but being arriv'd at Adrianople, the Army refus'd to march for want of their Pay, which forc'd him to return home with much Anger, and more Dishonour. Being arriv'd at Constantinople he summon'd the most beautiful Virgins of the City to appear at Court, in order to chuse from among 'em a Wife for his Son ; but having consulted with his Counsel he marry'd Stauratius to Theophania, one of the late Empress Irene's Relations, tho' she had been contracted before to another Man, and to add a Grace to the Nuptial he deflower'd two of the Virgins he had summon'd to attend him. This his brutish Behaviour threw the People into a general Discontent, and in Time drew the Divine Vengeance down upon his Head. He was so universally hated, that almost every Day some Conspiracy or other was form'd against him, which however by his extraordinary Diligence he always detected, and proceeded with exemplary Severity against the Conspirators, sparing neither Laymen nor Ecclesiasticks, putting some to Death, banishing others, and confiscating the Estates of the rest.

est. Whilst he was wholly intent upon these bloody inquisitions, the Bulgarians defeated a Party of his soldiers, taking from 'em eleven hundred Pounds of Gold, which he had assign'd for the Payment of his Army. The same Year before Easter, Crumus, King of Bulgaria, surpris'd Sardica, and put six thousand soldiers to the Sword. The Emperor made no other use of these Misfortunes, than with a more heavy Hand to oppress his distressed Subjects; such of his Commanders as had the good Fortune to escape the Hands of Crumus, he receiv'd so roughly, and terrify'd em with his Menaces, that he provok'd 'em to revolt, and side with the Bulgarians. He impos'd a new Tribute upon the City to repair Sardica, and omitted no Opportunity of exhausting his Subjects, and swelling his own Coffers, which however were hardly sufficient for his daily extravagant Expences.
Some of the Wealth, rais'd by these violent Extortions, fell into the Hands of the Saracens, who, making an Inroad into the Roman Territories, overthrew Leo, one of his Generals, and, besides the Slaughter of a great Multitude of his Men, took from him a great Quantity of Gold, with which he was going to pay the Army. To repair this Loss he tax'd all Churches and Monasteries, and laid an Imposition of eight Years upon the Houses of the Nobility, commanding Nicetas the Patrician to levy it, whilst he proceeded in another Expedition against the Bulgarians.
Being by this Time forsaken of God, and detested of Men, he had little reason to hope any good Success would crown his Undertakings; however he collected into one Body most of the Forces throughout his Empire, and having constrain'd many poor Men to serve on Foot at their own Charges, arm'd with Slings and Staves, and following him with their Curses, which were aggravated with those of his whole Army, he enter'd Bulgaria: Of whose Approach
when Crumus, who then lay at Marcellæ, was inform'd, being terrify'd at the Report of the Multitudes he brought

brought with him, sent and desir'd Peace; but the obstinate Emperor, blinded by his own Folly, and the Insinuations of his Flatterers, arrogantly refus'd it, and with a cowardly Temerity, on the twentieth of July, when the Dogstar rag'd over the Plains, he invaded the Country, often repeating these Words, Who shall go and deceive Ahab? What God or Devil is it that draws me on thus against my own Will? By which he seem'd sensible of that Fate which his Foreknowledge could not avoid. Whilst he was on his March, Byzantium, his beloved Favourite, forsook him, and fled with the Imperial Robe, and an Hundred Pounds of Gold, to Crumus, which was receiv'd as an unlucky Omen by some about him. For three Days together he seem'd to have the Advantage, but ascrib'd his Success not to the Mercy of God, but the Conduct and good Fortune of his Son Stauratius. He exceedingly threaten'd all the Bulgarian Officers that oppos'd his Progress, extended his Fury to Brutes, to Infants, and Persons of both Sexes, all Ages and Conditions, denying the Right of Burial to those who were slain, and with a greedy Eye and rapacious Hand seiz'd on whatever was able to satisfy either his Pride or his Avarice, punishing those Christians with the loss of their Ears and other Members, who were found embezzling any part of the Booty. Crumus being sensibly afflicted at the Calamities of his Subjects, sent again an humble submissive Message to him, offering him all he could demand on Condition he would quit the Country; but he, deaf to the Name of Peace, receiv'd the Messengers with Scorn, and dismiss'd 'em with Indignation. Whereupon Crumus, agitated by Despair and the Thirst of Revenge, fortify'd and secur'd all the Passes the Emperor had broken thro', and shut him up so close in the Bowels of his Country, that Nicephorus, when he had observ'd it, cry'd out with great Astonishment to those that were near him, That tho' they all had Wings they never could escape the Destruction which so nearly threaten'd them.

A. D.
811.

Nicephorus rages
with great Fury in Bulgaria;

them. Two Days after this Crumus set upon his Camp, and took it by Storm, in which fell the Emperor himself, with most of the Patricians and general Officers. Stauratius receiv'd a mortal Wound in his Neck, and escap'd in a Litter to Adrianople. All the Arms and Baggage fell into the Enemy's Hands; and Crumus having found Nicephorus his Corps, cut off his Head, and having fix'd it on a high Pole, expos'd it for some Time to the view of his Soldiers, after which he enclos'd his Skull in Silver, and in an insulting manner made his Nobility drink out of it.

The many fatherless Children and Widows which that Day's Destruction made, would have forc'd 'em to curse the Remembrance of it, had they not been comforted with this Thought, that the Tyrant perish'd in it. His Government was so insupportable, that he exceeded all the Monsters who ever reign'd before him, in Ambition, Luxury, and unheard of Barbarities; he was strongly inclin'd to the Sect of the Manichees, and commanded his Officers to use Ecclesiasticks no other than as Slaves. He deny'd Providence, and affirm'd no Power was greater than that of the Emperor, if he had but the Art of Government, for which reason he condemn'd all his Predecessors as ignorant and unskilful. He fell in the ninth Year of his Reign, the Eleventh of Charles the Great, A. D. 811.

II. Stauratius, as we observ'd before, escap'd wounded to Adrianople, where some of the Officers took Care to have him saluted and declar'd Emperor, to which the People were so little consenting, that they did not more rejoice at the Death of the Father, than they griev'd that the Son surviv'd him. Being sensible of his weak Condition, and the publick Hatred to which he was expos'd, he resolv'd to confirm his Wife Theophania in the Empire. The chief of the Army, and the Principal among the Nobility, who detested the Memory of Nicephorus, had fix'd their Eyes

Michael. Eyes on Michael Curopalates, who had marry'd Procopia, the late Emperor's Daughter, as a Person fittest for the Dignity. Michael, in regard of the Oaths he had given to Nicephorus and his Son, at first very zealously declin'd it; but being inform'd that Stauratius the better to secure the Empire to his Wife, in Distrust of him and the great Affection the Nobility bore him, design'd to pluck out his Eyes, he accepted of the Offer, and was declar'd Emperor. Upon which Stauratius forsook the Place, and retir'd with his Wife into a Monastery, where he took the Habit, and dy'd shortly after, having acted as Emperor but two Months and ten Days.

Michael was crown'd with great Solemnity by Nicephorus the Patriarch, after he had by a publick Writing oblig'd himself to maintain the Privileges of the Church, and abstain from Christian Blood. Shortly after he declar'd his Wife Procopia Empress, and had her crown'd together with his Son Theophylact, and then apply'd himself with great Care to heal the Wounds of the State. He made a Provision for the Widows and Children of such Soldiers as fell in the late Wars: He settled an honourable Pension upon Theophania, Stauratius's Widow: He presented the Patriarch with Fifty Pounds of Gold, and gave the Clergy Five and twenty, which was afterwards follow'd by more considerable Presents to them and the Senate; endeavouring to ease and restore those Families that had suffer'd under the Tyranny of the last Reign: And having in the best manner he could settled the Affairs of the Empire at home, he took care to enter into such Alliances as were necessary for the Security of it abroad. Among the rest he sent his Ambassadors to Charles the Great, with Orders to renew and confirm the Peace, and propose a Match between his Son Theophylact and Charles's Daughter. 'Tis not unlikely but Charles would willingly have listen'd to such a Proposal, had the Temper of those Times permitted it, but Michael was retir'd to a private ate State before a Matter of that Consequence could maturely be consider'd. The small Account we have of him from History represents him to us a Prince like some of his Predecessors, too good for the Age he liv'd in. He was zealous for the Honour of Christianity, and no less for the Safety of the Empire; but the Difficulties he had to contend withal were too great, and he found little other Satisfaction in his Undertakings than what resulted from his honest Intentions. He was hardly vested in the Imperial Purple, before he found himself engag'd in War almost on every side: The Saracens continu'd their usual Inroads into the Empire, which they depopulated by their daily Devastations; and the Bulgarians could not forget their ancient Animosities. Against the first Michael sent Leo, the Governor of those Parts, who watch'd his Opportunity so well, that he overthrew two thousand of their Men, and return'd with many Horses and a rich Booty. The War with the Bulgarians prov'd more fatal to the Emperor, which some attribute to his own Diffidence and Pusillanimity, others to the Treachery of Leo who succeeded him. In the beginning of this Emperors Reign there appear'd a better Understanding between the two Nations than had been formerly; for several of the Bulgarians had, upon a Permission obtain'd from Michael, settled themselves in the Roman Territories, and a mutual Friendship seem'd to be cultivated on each side: But it happen'd that some of the Emperor's Subjects, who had been taken Captive in the former Wars, broke their Prisons, and return'd home: Of these Crumus demanded an immediate Restitution, threatening to resent a Refusal in the most hostile manner imaginable. The Emperor, who was naturally averse to War, and a few others, were of Opinion that Crumus ought to be gratify'd, but the Majority carry'd it against 'em; whereupon the Bulgarians fell upon the Western Parts of the Empire, wasting all with Fire and Sword. Michael

A. D.
813.

Michael prepar'd with all Expedition to oppose 'em, and march'd at the Head of his Army into Thrace, where he suffer'd his unruly Soldiers to commit so many Disorders, that the Inhabitants began to despise him as a Man ignorant, or careless of Military Discipline. Crumus encamp'd himself near Adrianople, and after several slight Skirmishes both Armies came to an Engagement, in which the Imperialists were entirely defeated and put to Flight. Michael was so sensibly affected with this Misfortune, that he grew weary of the Imperial Purple, which requir'd a Man of a more warlike Genius, and therefore resolv'd to resign that Honour, which lay continually expos'd to the Hazards of War, and the Licentiousness of an Army. Thus is the Matter related by Theophanes, a Writer, who liv'd in that Age, and was a Sharer in the Transactions of those Times, who adds, that Michael earnestly press'd Leo to accept of the Empire, and suffer him to retire into a Cloyster, but that Leo for a long Time refus'd it, being a Man uncorrupted in his Loyalty, and sensible of the dangerous State of Affairs, and the daily Incursions of the Barbarians, 'till observing Michael resolv'd upon his Resignation, and that the Enemy approach'd the Imperial City, then with much difficulty he went attended by the Magistrates and Soldiers to the Tribunal, where he was unanimously declar'd Emperor. Thus have we the Matter related by Theophanes, if at least the latter part of that History be genuin; for some,

Cedrenus. upon good Grounds, have affirm'd, that he concluded it with the Reign of Nicephorus, and that the Residue was added by some other Hand: The other Historians that writ of that Age vary from Theophanes in some Particulars. They say Michael at first had the Advantage of the Bulgarians, 'till Leo, the General of the East, who aim'd at the Empire, drew off in the Heat of the Battel with the Forces under his Command, by which means the Imperialists were so much weaken'd, that the Bulgarians recover'd the Day; whereupon Michael relinquish'd the Government, and left Leo by his Valour to defend that Crown his Treachery had so inevitably expos'd. They add, that Michael withdrew not by any voluntary Abdication, but was forced to it by the ambitious Practices of Leo, who being left behind in Thrace to protect the Country, and restrain the Incursions of, the Barbarians, took the Advantage of the Emperor's Absence, and by some of his intimate Friends insinuated into the Minds of the Soldiers Michael's Ignorance and Inactivity, and the great Experience and Integrity of Leo. These Intrigues were manag'd with so much Art, that Leo was forc'd publickly by the Army to accept of those Honours which his Ambition in private had so earnestly courted. When Michael was inform'd at Constantinople of what the Army had done, some of his Friends advis'd him to assert his Title, and prepare for a vigorous Resistance: Among the rest his Wife Procopia, a Princess of a masculine ambitious Spirit, declar'd it became him rather to die than desert the Imperial Throne. But Michael being of a meek peaceable Disposition, affirm'd he was ready to part not only with his Crown but his Life, to save the Effusion of Christian Blood, and accordingly sent the Imperial Ensigns to Leo, who Leo IV. was thereupon universally acknowledg'd Emperor.

Day;

By whatever Artifices Leo obtain'd the Purple, he made it appear in the Course of his Reign that he well deserv'd it; and those Persons that were his avow'd Enemies upon the Account of Religion, were forc'd to allow him to have been an active vigilant Prince. Michael immediately upon his Resignation had withdrawn himself with his Wife and Children into a Monastery at Constantinople, but Leo thought it highly consist'd with his Safety to have 'em separated, and therefore confin'd the Father to a Monastery on the Island Prota, and banish'd Procopia and her Children, having first cruelly castrated Theophylact the Eldest, and, as some would have it, his Brother

ther Ignatius, who notwithstanding was afterwards Patriarch of Constantinople. After this he promoted such of his Friends as he thought he could with most safety confide in, especially his Fellow-servants, Thomas and Michael Balbus, of whom mention will be made in its proper Place. The Empire had exceedingly suffer'd by the Bulgarians during the Reigns of his Predecessors; he found the Army much weaken'd, and was sensible how difficult a Matter it was to fill it up with new Levies. In the mean Time the Barbarians, animated by their late Victories, continu'd their Incursions, and pierc'd into the very Bowels of Thrace, which they depopulated without control. Leo endeavour'd at first to restrain 'em by fair means, and for that purpose sent his Ambassadors to Crumus, whose frequent Advantages against them had drawn into such a Contempt of his Enemies, that he refus'd to listen to any amicable Overtures, and sent 'em back without granting 'em an Audience; whereupon the Emperor found himself oblig'd to Arm, and being strengthen'd with all the Forces he could draw together, he offer'd the Bulgarians Battel. The Dispute was very obstinate, and great Multitudes of Men fell on both sides, 'till at length Crumus, who was superior in Numbers, prevail'd, and routed the Romans, who fled at first in great Disorder; but Leo, who beheld all from an adjacent Eminence, observing that the Bulgarians, instead of pursuing their Enemies, were busied in pillaging their Camp, rally'd his Forces, and with a Reserve of Troops that continu'd unbroken, fell with great Fury upon the Bulgarians, renew'd the Fight, and obtain'd an entire Victory; great Numbers of the Enemy were taken Prisoners, and more found dead in the Field, among whom some reckon the King himself, who was slain by the Emperor's own Hand; others say he very narrowly escap'd with his Life, having receiv'd a Wound by an Arrow, and been beaten off his Horse. The Bulgarians were so weaken'd

A great Battel in Thrace,

where the Bulgarians were beaten.

by

by this Overthrow, that they were forc'd to sit at home in Peace for a long time after.

The Reputation of this Victory, and the Vigilance of the Emperor, restrain'd the Incursions of the Saracens in the East during his Reign ; and tho' he was a warlike active Prince, he chose rather to enjoy the Calm of an honourable Peace than trust to the Accidents of War ; for which reason he took care to maintain a good Intelligence with his Neighbours. So that being, in a great measure, at Peace even with those Nations who had sworn an irreconcilable Enmity to the Empire, he was at leisure to reflect on the unhappy Disputes that divided the Church. The prosperous Course of his Affairs render'd him free and independent, and therefore he had an Opportunity of entering into the Merit of the Cause, without the necessity of founding his Authority upon the Interest either of the one or the other Party. They who had asserted the Worship of Images in the Church continu'd to maintain the Dispute with much Heat and Animosity, and had pursu'd the Argument so far, that they were scarce esteem'd Christians who had not adher'd to their Opinion. The Novelty of the Doctrine, and the Absurdity of it too, together with a Consideration of the private Designs, or Necessities of those among his Predecessors who espous'd it, and the undutiful Behaviour they met withal from the See of Rome, who had the Courage to oppose it, could not but raise in Leo an utter Aversion to it. There are many Things indifferent in themselves which either the Artifice of some, or the Ignorance of others draw into pernicious Consequences : The Representation of Jesus Christ in the several Passages of his Life, together with that of the Saints and Martyrs, may serve to enliven the Affections of the truly devout Christians ; but when the Adoration of those Images is forc'd as a necessary part of our Religion, instead of a lively Remembrance, and a grateful Commemoration ; when those Honours are requir'd

Leo opposes the Worship of Images.

A. D.
815.

to be paid to the Work of Mens Hands, which are only due to the everliving God ; 'tis time then to pluck up that Tree by the Roots, which produces such venomous Fruit. So that without offering at those frivolous Motives Baronius hath cited from his infallible Authors, we may allow Leo had just reason to use his Authority, as he did, with so much Vigor to restrain so pestilent an Innovation. He enforc'd the Observance of the Council celebrated at Constantinople in the Year 754, under Constantinus Copronymus, and publish'd an Edict, wherein he absolutely prohibited the Divine Worship that had been paid to Images, and commanded 'em to be remov'd out of the Church, threatening those with Exile who disobey'd his Ordonnance. Accordingly Nicephorus the Patriarch was banish'd, and Theodotus the Monk, who is said to have encourag'd the Emperor in these Proceedings, was substituted in his room ; with Nicephorus likewise were banish'd Nicetas a Patrician, and one of the Empress Irene's Relations, together with Theodorus an Abbot, and Theophanes the Historian ; tho' we are told by Baronius, that all the rest but Nicephorus, who dy'd in Exile in the Year 828, were shortly after restor'd by the Emperor, who, partly by fair Promises, and partly by Menaces, had perswaded 'em to comply.

These Proceedings entertain'd the Emperor the remaining part of his Reign, till the Behaviour of Michael Balbus forc'd him to provide for his own Security ; this Michael had formerly serv'd as his Companion in the Wars, for which reason, when he came to be Emperor, he advanc'd him considerably in the Government, which he imputed not so much to Leo's Favour as his own Deserts : Among other Vices with which he was incumber'd, he had a most busie lavish Tongue, and would frequently, in common Discourse, reflect on the Emperor, threatening to depose him, and by force marry the Empress. Tho' Leo was frequently inform'd of Michael's Presumption, yet, being averſe both to Jealouſie and Cruelty, his want of Caution procur'd his Ruin; knowing his talkative Diſtemper he imputed it to that, 'till repeated Provocations, and an apparent Conviction made him reſolve to puniſh him. He had great Reaſon to think that what Michael had ſo freely utter'd proceeded rather from ſome wicked Deſign form'd between him and his Accomplices, as it afterwards appear'd when it was too late, than his uſual vein of talking; wherefore he order'd him to be apprehended, and brought immediately to his Trial, where the Evidence being found direct againſt him he was condemn'd, and ſentenc'd to be burnt alive. The Trial was on Chriſtmas Eve, and as the Officers were leading him up to Execution, Theodoſia the Empreſs ran with an intemperate Fury to her Husband, whom ſhe call'd Tyrant, and prophane, in that he could not abſtain from Blood at a Time when he was about to partake of the Holy Sacrament. Leo being touch'd with the Senſe of what ſhe utter'd, and fearing to offend God, conſented to a Reprieve, but commanded his Legs to be loaden with Irons, of which he kept the Keys himſelf, and committed him to the Cuſtody of Papia, a Perſon whom he had highly oblig'd, and in whom therefore he thought he could with greateſt ſafety confide; after which he upbraided his Wife for her unſeaſonable Paſſion, and told her he had comply'd with her Deſires, tho' he knew it would end in the Deſtruction of her and her Children.

yet,

The Apprehenſions of Michael's Deſigns ſunk ſo deep in the Emperor's Mind that he could not reſt, but roſe in great Conſternation the Night following, and reſolv'd to ſecure himſelf from the Traitor; accordingly he broke that Inſtant into Papia's Houſe, where he found the Priſoner lodg'd in a very rich Bed faſt a-ſleep, and his Goaler reſting on the Floor with equal Security by him. The diſtracted Emperor was ſo amaz'd at this unexpected Sight, that he retir'd without any Noiſe, reſolving to puniſh both the one and the other. This Midnight Visit was not made with so much Privacy, but the Emperor was discover'd by one of the Watch, who inform'd Papia of what he had observ'd, and by that means put both him and Michael upon their Guard. They could not but be sensible of the Danger they were in, and therefore resolv'd to provide for their own Safety by giving the first Blow. Michael had request-ed that some religious Person might be admitted to confer with him, which, out of respect to his Soul's Safety, the Emperor readily granted; this Man Michael sent to the Conspirators, and threaten'd, that unless by some speedy Blow they procur'd his Release, he would discover 'em all to Leo. The Conspirators being alarm'd at this Message, and sensible of the great Danger they were in, resolv'd to lose no Time, and mingled themselves with those who assisted at Divine Service in the Emperor's Chappel, and having hid their Daggers under their Habits, were early in the Morning admitted with them into the Palace; at first they dispos'd of themselves in a private Corner of the Chappel, 'till the Emperor came to his Devotions, and then at a certain Signal they fell upon him in the midst of Divine Service, and most barbarously murder'd him. At first they mistook the Dean of the Chappel for Leo, 'till he discover'd to 'em his bald Head, which secur'd his Life. Leo, foreseeing their Design, retir'd in the mean time to the Altar, where he defended himself for some time with great Bravery, 'till being at length overcome by the Numbers of his Enemies, who, without any regard to that sacred Place, were resolv'd to compleat what they had begun; he first lost his Hand in the Dispute, and at last his Head. This was the unhappy End of Leo, who deserv'd a better Fate, after he had govern'd the Empire with much Prudence and Reputation upwards of seven Years and a half. He was slain in the seventh Year of Lewis the Debonnaire, the fourth of Pope Paschal, An. Dom. 820.

Leo murder'd.

The

The Fury of the Conspirators did not terminate in the Death of Leo ; they ran with great Violence from the Chappel to the Court, where they seiz'd on the Empress Theodofia, and shut her up in a Monastery, and forc'd her four Sons into the Island Prota, where by Michael's Order they were afterwards castrated, in which cruel Operation the younger lost his Life, and the elder his Speech. In the mean Time Michael, being now releas'd from his Prison, was conducted in a tumultuous manner to the Imperial Throne, where he was saluted Emperor with the Shackles still on his Feet, for the Key was no where to be found, so that at last they were forc'd to knock the Bolts off with a Hammer, after which he was crown'd in the great Church by the Hands of the Patriarch.

Tho' the Death of Leo was very much regretted by the generality of the People, who esteem'd him as a prudent, moderate and valiant Emperor, yet the great Patrons of Images exclaim'd against him in the most bitter Terms imaginable, comparing him to Abab, Julian the Apostate, and other Monsters in History ; and at the same Time loaded his Successor, who had caus'd him to be assassinated, with the highest Encomiums, calling him the promis'd of God, a second David, another Josias, the King of Peace, and the like : But this good Humour did not continue long towards him ; for when they found he had entertain'd the same Aversion to Image-Worship his Predecessor had done before him, then they very industriously enquir'd into all his ill Qualities, and would allow him to be Master of none that were good.

At first he recall'd great Numbers of Bishops and Monks that had been banish'd by Leo, and summon'd them to a Council to be held at Constantinople, together with those that differ'd from 'em in Opinion, there to dispute the Point in question ; but the Champions refus'd to enter into any Conference with their Adversaries, declaring that what they maintain'd was built upon such firm Foundations of Truth, that it could admit of no Dispute. Tho' 'tis very likely they declin'd to enter the List upon no other Account, but because they knew themselves unable to support their Cause by the Authority of the Holy Scriptures, and the Writings of the Fathers. However it were, this Obstinacy very much displeas'd the Emperor, who was once inclinable, in some measure, to gratifie them; notwithstanding which he proceeded with no Rigour against them, but indulg'd 'em the use of Images, provided it was without the Imperial City. In the mean Time the Emperor himself entertain'd very absurd Notions in Religion. He was born at Amorium, a City of Phrygia, which was inhabited chiefly by Jews, and such Christians who for their Heretical Opinions had been driven from their Native Habitations, between whom arose a medly in Religion, with which Michael was infected in his Youth, and carry'd the Infection with him to his Grave; among other Absurdities he kept the Jewish Sabbath, and deny'd the Resurrection of the Dead. Upon this Account it's no wonder if his whole Reign was infested with Wars and Troubles, and the Infidels abridg'd him both of his Honour and his Empire.

A Civil War rais'd
by Thomas,

The first Disturbance he met with in the Beginning of his Reign was from a Civil War, bloody and expensive, rais'd by Thomas, a Man of great Power in the East, of whom mention was made before; as soon as he heard that Leo, his great Benefactor, was murder'd by Michael, he took Arms, and in a short Time rais'd a very considerable Army, compos'd of some who follow'd him out of Love to his Person, others out of a Disaffection to Michael, and of the rest whom the hopes of Plunder had allur'd into the Field. Thomas was naturally ambitious, but was withal Master of many good Qualities, which seem'd to favour his Ambition; the Gravity of his Aspect commanded an Esteem from all that beheld him, him, at the same Time that his Eloquence and Affability made him be belov'd by all that heard him, a Quality which render'd him exceeding grateful to the Soldiers, who besides admir'd him for his vast Strength and admirable Courage.

These Advantages soon made him Master of most of the Eastern Provinces, where he seiz'd on the Publick Revenue, and having wasted Asia in a most miserable manner, he took the whole Region, except a few Provinces whom their Affection to the Emperor, and the valiant Conduct of Olbianus and Catacelas, two of Michael's Commanders, had maintain'd against him.

These Civil Embroilments encourag'd the Saracens to take Arms, and with their usual Fury break into the Territories of the Empire, at which Thomas was extreamly affected, for he was afraid lest his Men would desert him, and return to the Defence of their own Possessions ; at first therefore he restrain'd the Incursions of the Barbarians by a sudden Onset, and then charm'd 'em with a Promise that he would fight in their behalf, and submit such Territories of the Empire, as he should conquer, to their Command. Having, by this means, diverted a Storm that hung over him, he assum'd the Imperial Authority, and in every respect acted as Emperor. He strengthen'd his Army by new Levies, drawn not only out of the adjacent Parts, but from among the Egyptians, Indians, Persians, and other Nations most remote. At the same Time he chang'd his Name for that of Constantine, and omitted nothing requisite to the Support of that Title he had usurp'd. By this Time he was grown strong enough to make Head against the Forces the Emperor had sent to surprize him, and was so fortunate in an Engagement with them, that he gave them a total Defeat ; and very industriously pursuing the Course of his Fortunes he fitted out a strong Fleet, with which he master'd the Emperor's Navy, and marching at the Head of eighty thousand Men, appointed Lesbos for the Place of general Rendezvous. Michael, who beheld the prodigious Progress he made against him, reinforc'd all his Garrisons, and endeavour'd to confirm the Soldiers by fair Words and bountiful Presents, notwithstanding which he was no sooner return'd back to Constantinople, and Thomas by the Opportunity of a dark Night got over into Thrace, before they revolted, and follow'd the Usurper to the Siege of the Imperial City. Thomas, like a Torrent, bearing down all before him both by Sea and Land, had promis'd himself that the Inhabitants of Constantinople would open their Gates to him at his first Approach, but, on the contrary, was much surpriz'd when he saw they receiv'd him with a very vigorous Opposition, and most opprobrious Language. This Union and Resolution in the Inhabitants very much distracted him, and tho' he had been twice repuls'd, he was resolv'd to try his Fortune once more, and to storm the City both by Sea and Land. Accordingly he dispers'd his Orders with much Caution and Sagacity, and omitted nothing that might strike Terror into the Inhabitants, and force 'em to surrender, when on a sudden a violent Storm arose, which dissipated his Ships by Sea, and render'd his battering Engines useless and ungovernable. This Disappointment, and some successful Sallies of the Besieg'd, together with the Approach of Winter, forc'd him to raise his Siege with a Resolution to return again in the Beginning of the Spring; but Fortune, which had hitherto attended him with Success in all his Undertakings, began now to forsake him. Michael had Time, during this Recess, to furnish himself with a Fleet, and a Land Army, so that the Tyrant, at his Return, met with greater Opposition than he had done before.

Thomas had an experienc'd Commander in his Army call'd Gregory, who being nearly related to Leo, the late Emperor, had been banish'd by Michael into the

the Island Scirus, one of the Cyclades, for which Reason at the Beginning of the War, he declar'd for the Usurper, who put a great Confidence in him; but now, observing how the Face of Affairs began to change, he listen'd to the Emperor's Sollicitations, and resolv'd to make his Peace with Michael, and the rather, because his Wife and Children were in his Hands. This Negotiation was not carry'd on so privately, but that Thomas had timely Notice of it; he knew his Design was to desert to the Emperor with that part of the Army which he commanded; but as he was marching away, and before the Emperor could receive the News of his Revolt, he left a sufficient Number of his Troops to maintain the Siege, and with the rest fell upon Gregory, defeated his whole Party, and took him alive, but put him instantly to Death, and then return'd in great Triumph back to the Siege, where as great Rejoycings were made as if he had obtain'd a mighty Victory, which was more than over-ballanc'd by the Loss of his best Ships, which were burnt, sunk, or taken by the Emperor's Fleet.

In the mean Time Mortagon, King of the Bulgarians, had been inform'd that Michael was block'd up by his own Subjects in the Capitol of his Empire, and, pitying rather the Dignity than person of the Emperor, sent private Messengers to him, who encourag'd him with Promises of a speedy Relief from their Master, who accordingly march'd against Thomas, tho' the Emperor had endeavour'd to dissuade him from the Expedition, either for that he was unwilling to have his Country wasted by another Army, or that a Reward answerable to so seasonable and friendly an Assistance, would too much exhaust his Treasury, in the improving of which he equall'd, if not exceeded, the most covetous of his Predecessors. When Thomas heard of the Bulgarians Approach he was uncertain what Measures to take; he knew himself unable to oppose them, and at the same Time who is overthrown by the Bulgarians,

con-

continue the Siege, and which of the two Expedients was the best, he could not easily determine; at length he resolv'd to fight the Bulgarians, by whom he was overthrown, losing his Camp, and all his Equipage. After this his Party declin'd every Day. When his Fleet, which lay before Constantinople, had receiv'd News of his Defeat, it deserted to the Emperor, and the Residue of his Army watch'd all Opportunities of forsaking him. At first he pretended to continue the Siege, but when he found all his Attempts ineffectual, he rais'd it, and encamp'd at a Place call'd Diabassis, some Furlongs distant from the City, from whence he wasted all the Country round about. His Retreat from the City, and the Havock he made in the Territories of it, at once encourag'd and provok'd the Emperor to send an Army out against him, which he receiv'd with great Bravery, but was overthrown rather by the Treachery of his own Soldiers, than the Valour of his Enemies. The Fortune of this Battel drove him to Adrianople, where, with such as had Courage and Fidelity enough to follow him, he was block'd up by the Emperor's Forces, till at length his own People, after they had endur'd unspeakable Hardships, deliver'd him up bound to the Emperor, who cut off his Hands and Legs, and then show'd him upon an Ass to all the Camp. Michael had a great Mind to know from him, if any of his own Servants or Officers underhand favour'd the Rebellion, had not John Exabulius, the Patrician, advis'd him not to trust an Enemy with the Accusation of his Friends; so that Thomas dy'd of his Torments without being suffer'd to impeach any one, which it's thought he was very ready to have done. The War did not end immediately with the Death of Thomas, some Cities and Castles, which had either been seiz'd by him, or declar'd for him, continu'd to hold out for some Time; but at length they were all reduc'd either by Force, Treachery, or some other Accident, and the Civil War was extinguish'd on every side.

As

As this War was fierce and bloody in it self, so was it attended with several publick Calamities, as well in Europe as Asia; nothing was more frequent than unexpected Fires, sudden and destructive Earthquakes, civil Broils, Destruction of Cities, Signs in the Heavens, Desolations on the Earth, with whatever else God in his Anger inflicts on the Sons of Men, all which is attributed by Cedrenus to the Contempt of Images. And as if the Empire suffer'd not enough at home, it was at the same Time assaulted by a dangerous Enemy from abroad, who lopp'd off a considerable Member from it. The Saracens were now grown so numerous in Spain, that they began to look on the Country as too narrow for 'em: Wherefore observing the distracted Condition of the Empire, and that Michael was so closely press'd by Thomas, that he was hardly at leisure to defend a Part, when he was in danger of losing the whole, they sail'd under the Conduct of their Prince in search of some fruitful Island belonging to the Emperor, which might encourage 'em to plant a Colony in it. They ravag'd with an insolent Barbarity most of the Islands in the Mediterranean, and at length touch'd upon that of Crete, meeting with no Opposition, for all the Ships and Garrisons were gone off to assist Thomas. The Prince was taken with the Pleasantness and Fertility of Crete, so that he return'd the Spring following with a Fleet consisting of forty Ships well furnish'd with Soldiers, and landed upon the Island; he encamp'd on the Promontory Charax, and from thence sent spies out to discover the Country, and in the mean Time set Fire to all his Ships, to take from his Followers any Thoughts of a Return.

The Emperor, being advertis'd of this Descent, sent a sufficient Number of Troops, under the Command of Damianus, to drive the Saracens out of the Island. Damianus, being join'd with Photinus, Præfect of the East, gave the Saracens Battel, who at the first Onset kill'd Damianus, and routed the whole Army;

The Saracens settle in Crete.

my; after which they met with none to oppose 'em, but having built a City near a Commodious Port, which they call'd Candia, and which, in a great Measure, commanded the whole Island, they by degrees took in the rest of the Towns, and carefully intruded their Superstitions where-ever they planted their Arms. Thus Crete at once lost her Liberty, and her ancient Name, for her new Masters call'd the whole Island Candia, after the Name of the City before-mention'd.

Michael, having put an end to the Civil Wars, thought it would be a great Blemish to his Reign, if he suffer'd the Saracens to settle in Crete; where-upon he sent away Craterus with a considerable Fleet to recover the Island. Craterus landed his Men without any Opposition, and fell very briskly upon the Enemy, who receiv'd him with an equal Resolution. The Fight continu'd from Day-break 'till Noon, and as yet no Discovery could be made on which side the Victory inclin'd, but towards the Evening the Romans had visibly the Advantage, and the Saracens, many of whom were Slain, and others taken Prisoners, fled away in great Disorder. Had the Romans pursu'd their Point, the City it self had fallen into their Hands, but they thinking it time enough the next Day to put an end to the War, which they already judg'd to be in a great measure concluded, spent the Night in Riot and Drunkenness, not so much as setting a Watch to observe the Enemy's Motions; who, tho' very much broken and fatigu'd by the Labours of the preceding Day, would not omit an Opportunity which the Indiscretion of their Enemies had so favourably presented 'em; they fell upon 'em with great Fury, as they lay in their Camp fetter'd with Wine and Sleep, and cut 'em all off, hardly suffering one to escape to give the Emperor an Account of their Expedition, except the General himself, who, getting on Board a Merchantman, escap'd to the Isle of Coos, where where notwithstanding he was shortly after surpriz'd, and nail'd to a Cross by the Saracens. After this Defeat the Emperor contented himself with restraining the insolent Piracies of these Saracens, who continu'd in Possession of the Island 'till the Year 897, at which Time it was recover'd by Basilius the Emperor, as it will be made appear in its proper Place.

Notwithstanding these severe Calamities, which fill'd up every Hour of this unfortunate Emperor's Reign, he led a loose desolute Life without any regard to Religion, or the Laws. Having lately bury'd his Wife, he had a great Desire to Marry again, and that it might be thought to be done at the Request, and for the Benefit of his People, he prevail'd with some of the leading Men in the Senate to Petition him to it, as a Thing highly conducing to the Safety of the State; and having cast his Eyes on Euphrosyna, one of Constantine the Son of Irene's Daughters, he forc'd her out of a Convent, where, from her Infancy, she had led a recluse Life, and marry'd her. This Action prov'd of very dangerous Consequence to the Empire, for Euphemius, a Man of great Interest and Authority in the Army, falling in Love, after the Example of his Master, with another of these devoted Virgins, forc'd her out of her Monastery, and debauch'd her. Her Brothers, as soon as they heard of this Irreligious Outrage, loudly complain'd of it to the Emperor, who commanded the Governor of Sicily, where the Fact was committed, to examine into the Matter, and if he found what was alledg'd against him true, then to cut off the Offender's Nose. Euphemius, who little expected to have been proceeded against with so much Severity, drew several other of the Officers into a Conspiracy with him, and easily repuls'd the Governor when he came to execute his Orders; after which he fled into Africk, where he promis'd the Saracen Governor of that Place to betray Sicily into his Hands, and pay him a large Tribute,

Euphemi-
us declar'd Emperor by
the Sara-
cens.

and is mur-
der'd.

Michael
dies.

bute, provided he would declare him Emperor, and assist him with Forces sufficient to make good his Title. To this the Saracens readily consented, and having supply'd him with a good Number of Troops he declar'd him Emperor, and sent him back to make good his Promise. With these Forces he landed in Sicily, and travers'd round the Island in order to persuade the Inhabitants to receive him for their Prince; but when he came toward Syracuse he endeavour'd, in a flattering Speech, to persuade the Inhabitants, who stood on the Walls, to declare for him. Among the rest he observ'd two Brothers, who were Men of great Authority in the City, that seem'd to pay him more Respect, and hear him with more Attention than the rest; at which being highly pleas'd he call'd 'em to him, and advanc'd from the rest of his Company to salute the foremost of them, who caught him by the Hair of his Head, whilst the other cut it off. Tho' Euphemius had thus miscarry'd in his own Designs, the Saracens would not quit the Advantage he had put into their Hands; for being thus introduc'd by him, they got Possession not only of that Island, but of Calabria, and other adjacent Parts, wasting all with Fire and Sword.

Such as these were the most remarkable Transactions during this Emperor's Reign, which makes the Report of those, who affirm he dy'd of Madness, the more credible: He was undoubtedly a very unfortunate Prince, happy only in this, that his Son succeeded him in the Empire, a Thing which had not been observ'd for a long Time before. He was more Valiant than Wise, and in every Respect fitter for the Camp than the Court, tho' he was fitter to obey than command in either. He dy'd on the First of October, An. Dom. 829, after he had reign'd Eight Years and Six Months.

Theophi-
lus succeeds
him.

So soon as Michael was dead, Theophilus, his Son, was universally declar'd and acknowledg'd Emperor, the Heir at once of his Father's Honours, and Enmity

mity to Images : His very Enemies allow him to have been a strict Observer of Justice, and a severe Asserter of the Laws of the Empire. He was so far from approving the Murder of Leo, tho' his Father ow'd both his Life and Dignity to it, that he resolv'd to punish all those who had been Accomplices in it ; to which Purpose, by a publick Edict, he summon'd the chief of the Nobility, and great Officers of the Empire, to wait on him in the Palace call'd Magnaura, or Pentapyrgium ; where, when they were assembled, he told 'em with a sedate Air, That his Father had design'd, in his Life-time, to distinguish those with particular Marks of his Favour, who had been instrumental in his Promotion ; and since Death had prevented him he was oblig'd, as his Executor, to pay the Debt : For which reason he desir'd them to withdraw from the rest into a peculiar Place, where he would examine the particular Merit of each Person, and reward 'em accordingly. Hereupon they who had been concern'd in the Death of Leo, discover'd themselves with great Chearfulness, and were all by the Emperor's Order punish'd as Murderers. After this he sent Euphrosyna back to the Monastery from whence his Father had taken her, and apply'd himself with great Diligence to the Government of the State. His Wars with the Saracens were many, and carry'd on with various Success : And tho' in the end the Fortune of the Infidels prevail'd, he made it appear, by the happy Choice of his Captains, that he could distinguish, and knew how to prefer Men of Worth and Conduct. Alexius Moseles, an Armenian by Birth, had marry'd one of his Daughters. This Man was beautiful in his Person, and of a solid Judgment, upon which Account he advanc'd him to the highest Offices in the Empire ; and having as yet no Son to succeed him, he at last created him Cesar, and sent him, at the Head of a numerous Army, against the Saracens, who rag'd with great Fury in Italy. Alexius his Conduct in that Employment was highly approv'd by all but those who repin'd at his good Fortune, who represented him as an ambitious Person, and one who had a Design upon the Empire. These their Suggestions they endeavour'd to strengthen with an old Prophecy, which intimated that A. should depose Th. Tho' this Emperor is thought by some to have been too much addicted himself to the Art of foretelling, yet he gave no Ear to those Insinuations, but continu'd Alexius in his Favour: And when Alexius, being inform'd of what had been practis'd against him, desir'd leave to retire to a Monastick Life, the Emperor refus'd his Request; and commanded him to retain the Rank and Power he had in the Empire, and that as well because he would not so far injure his Daughter, as because he did not believe what had been alledged against him. However Theophilus having a Son shortly after, and his Daughter dying much about the same Time, he very unwillingly consented to the repeated Importunities of Alexius, and appointed him such Places as he thought would be most convenient for his Retirement.

This generous Confidence and Magnanimity in Theophilus, made him belov'd by all the Men of Worth in his Empire, so that his Armies were generally supply'd with experienc'd Commanders, tho' none appear'd so eminent in his Service as Manuel and Theophobus, the Variety of whose Fortunes make not the least Figure in this Emperor's Reign. Manuel had serv'd in very eminent Posts under former Emperors, and Theophobus was the base Son of a Persian Ambassador, descended from the Blood Royal of that Nation, who, dying in his Embassy, left him an Infant at Constantinople, where he was entertain'd in the Imperial Palace, and educated after the manner of the Romans. The continual Wars between the Saracens and the Persians had driven away, or destroy'd, all those of the Royal House in Persia, for which reason the few Persians that surviv'd the Calamities lamities of their Country sent to the Emperor, and desir'd Theophobus for their King; which Theophilus refus'd, chusing rather to make him a Patrician, and marry him to one of his Sisters. At the same time he gave his Subjects leave to marry with the Persians, which brought many of that Nation over, who list'd themselves into his Army, and were form'd into one Body, call'd the Persian Legion; from whence the Emperor promis'd himself no small Service in the Expedition he was preparing against the Saracens, who had lately invaded and wasted the Territories of the Empire, for which reason the Emperor resolv'd to chastise 'em. When both Armies came within view of each other, and the Enemy were consulting whether it was adviseable to fight, Manuel advis'd the Emperor not to engage in Person, affirming it to be below his Dignity to contend with one so much inferior to him as was the General of the Saracens. This was oppos'd by Theophobus, to whom the Emperor inclin'd, and the next Morning both Armies came to a Battel, which lasted very long, 'till at length the Roman Legions gave Ground and fled, leaving the Emperor with his Guard, two thousand Persians, and Theophobus upon an Hill, where they were surrounded by the Saracens, who labour'd hard to take him Prisoner, and his own Men were as resolute to defend him. Night coming on put an end to the Contention, and when it was dark the Soldiers, by Theophobus his Order, fill'd the Air with loud Acclamations, and made so great a Noise with their Trumpets, and other warlike Instruments, that the Saracens, deceiv'd by the Stratagem, concluded they had receiv'd some Relief, and retreated to a great distance for fear of being surrounded, by which means the Emperor escap'd to the rest of the Army. This seasonable Stratagem very much rais'd Theophobus his Reputation, which endear'd him more than ever to his Countrymen, and made 'em petition the Emperor that they might act against the Saracens in a separate Body under his

The Emperor in great Danger.

Conduct, and so far prevail'd that the Emperor would suffer no one else to command 'em.

A. D.
833.

The ill Success of this Expedition serv'd only to make the Emperor more vigorous in Preparations for the next Campaign, in which his Armies were crown'd with a glorious Success: For he gain'd an entire Victory over the Infidels, kill'd great Numbers upon the Spot, and took above twenty thousand Prisoners, whom he carry'd in great Triumph to Constantinople. This encourag'd him to make another Attempt the Spring following; but his Army was defeated by the Saracens, and he himself in great Danger of being taken Prisoner; for in the Heat of the Action he advanc'd, with a Body of his Troops, too far into the Enemies Ranks; when Manuel, considering what a Disgrace it would be to the Roman Name and Empire to have the Emperor taken Prisoner, broke through to him, and found him weary'd and in Despair. Manuel entreated the Emperor to follow him, whilst he open'd his way through the thickest of his Enemies, which Theophilus declin'd, alledging he should discourage his Army by his Flight; which when Manuel, who was advanc'd forward in order to open his way for him, perceiv'd, he return'd back, and with his Sword directed at him threaten'd to kill him unless he follow'd, declaring the State would suffer more in his Captivity than his Death, by which Loyal Menace he brought him off. Manuel, upon this, was esteem'd his Deliverer, and the Emperor had a just Sense of the Service he had done him, but unhappily gave Ear to those who envy'd his Reputation, and, like other Princes, inclin'd to depress him, whom he was not able to reward according to his Deserts. Some of Theophilus his Flatterers had represented Manuel to the Emperor, as one who was preparing for an Usurpation, whereupon it was privately determin'd to deprive him of his Sight; of which when Manuel was by a faithful Friend inform'd, he fled over to the Saracens, and upon Condition he should not be constrain'd strain'd to renounce his Religion, he enter'd himself into their Service. The Reception the Saracens gave Manuel makes it evident how much a Man of Worth is esteem'd, even by his Enemies. They advanc'd him to the highest Rank of Honour and Command, entrusted him with the Conduct of their Armies against their Neighbours with whom they were at War, and did nothing without the Advice and Approbation of Manuel, who no way wrong'd the high Trust repos'd in him, but in all Respects acquitted himself with Honour and Reputation.

The Fame of his great Authority, and greater Services among the Saracens, quickly flew to Constantinople, and made the Emperor lament the Loss of a faithful Servant that had been the Support, and an Ornament to the State, and deserv'd better Usage from him. He was sensible that all the Honours he receiv'd from his Enemies blacken'd him with Ingratitude, and that it became him, as a Prince and Christian, to recover him from the Infidels. To this Purpose he entrusted one of those Itinerant Monks, who frequently rov'd about the World in those Days, with a Message to him. Manuel himself, tho' adorn'd with all the Favours the Saracens could confer upon him, consider'd himself as no other than a glorious Exile, and still retain'd an invincible Love to his Native Country, from whence the Jealousie of his Master, enflam'd by the Artifices of his Enemies, had unjustly driven him, so that he lent a ready Ear to the Message of the Monk, who presented him with Letters from the Emperor strengthen'd with a Seal of Gold and a Cross. Manuel was extreamly pleas'd with the Invitation the Emperor had made him, and waited only for an Opportunity that might favour his Return, which was effected after this manner. He desir'd leave of Ishmael, at that time Prince of the Saracens, to march against the Romans into Cappadocia, where, he said, he should have an occasion of revenging himself upon those who had unjustly accus'd him him to the Emperor. The Saracens, who hitherto could never prevail with him to fight against his Countrymen, were glad of the Overture, and sent him away at the Head of a compleat Army, attended by the young Prince Ishmael's Son. The Governour of Cappadocia had before-hand been prepar'd to receive him, so that being arriv'd at the Place desir'd, and having withdrawn at a convenient distance from the Army, under a Pretence of Hunting, he advis'd the young Prince, who accompany'd him, to retire back to the Saracens, and acquaint them with the Resolution he had taken of returning home. Being arriv'd at Constantinople he was receiv'd with great Solemnity by the Emperor, who conferr'd on him the highest Honours of the Empire, and made him stand as God-father to his Son Michael, whom he shortly after invested with the Imperial Purple. The Saracens were no less offended than the Emperor was pleas'd at his Return, so that they prepar'd to express their Resentments the Spring following, in which however nothing memorable was transacted on either side, for both Armies were seiz'd with a Panick Fear, and concluded the Campaign without coming to an Engagement.

The Persians Muti-
ny.

The Year following Theophilus invaded Syria, which he wasted as he march'd along, and having made himself Master of some of their strongest Forts, and taken a great Number of Prisoners, he return'd to Constantinople; leaving Theophobus to maintain his new Conquests, and command the Army. But now the Persians, who were increas'd to thirty thousand Men, began to disdain a Subjection to any Prince but one of their own Nation, and therefore in a mutinous manner seiz'd on Theophobus at Sinope, and declar'd him Emperor. At first he us'd all the Arguments and Entreaties he could to divert 'em from it, but when he found it was to no purpose, he outwardly seem'd to accept of the Honour, but privately gave Theophilus an Assurance of his Averseness to it, and escap'd with the first Opportunity to Constantinople, where he was caref's'd in an high degree by the Emperor, who continu'd all his Honours to him. The Persians; being thus disappointed of their Prince, begg'd Pardon of Theophilus, who receiv'd 'em into Favour; but, to prevent the like Attempts for the future, he dispers'd them, by two thousand in a Body, into several remote Provinces, under their proper Officers.
the

Theophilus, in the late Ravage he had made in Syria, had, contrary to the earnest Request of the Prince of the Saracens, destroy'd Sozopetra, the Place of his Nativity; at which he was so enrag'd, that breathing nothing but Revenge, he rais'd a mighty Army compos'd of many Nations, as well of Africk, as in the East, and having commanded every Soldier to impress on his Target the Word Amorium, the Birth-place of Theophilus, he resolv'd never to sheath his Sword till he had destroy'd it. The Emperor, being inform'd of these mighty Preparations, march'd with what Forces he could raise to Dorylaeum, a Town in Phrygia major, about three Days Journey from Amorium. There having call'd a Council of War, he was advis'd, by several of his Officers, to decline an Engagement with the Saracens, whose Army exceeded his in Numbers, and translate the Inhabitants of Amorium to some other Place. The Emperor, imagining such a Proceeding would reflect upon his Honour, resolv'd to venture all in the Defence and Protection of it, and accordingly sent Aetius, General of the East, with a strong Party to command in it. The Prince of the Saracens had muster'd all his Forces at Tarsus, where he resolv'd not to march on directly to Amorium, but to send his Son with part of the Army to try the Strength of the Emperor's Forces, and take such Measures afterwards, as should be suitable to the Success of that Attempt. The young Prince march'd at the Head of ten thousand Turks, and a strong Party of Armenians, to a Place call'd Dazymenum, D 3 where

The Romans overthrown by the Saracens,

where both Armies came to an Engagement. At first the Fortune of the Day seem'd to incline to the Romans, but in the Pursuit they were so exceedingly gaul'd by the Arrows of the Turks, that they who just before seem'd secure of the Victory turn'd back in great Confusion, and left the Emperor to the Defence of the Persians, who encompass'd him round, and with much Courage labour'd to preserve him. However he had infallibly been lost had not Night come upon 'em, and some Rain fallen, which render'd the Turkish Bow-string of no use, and gave the Imperialists an Opportunity to Retreat. Manuel, who had the Command of the Watch, observ'd the Persians discoursing in their own Language with the Saracens about betraying the Roman Army, and returning into their own Country. Of this he immediately inform'd the Emperor, and advis'd him to consult his own Safety, who accordingly retreated to Chiliocomum.

who Besiege Amorium,

In the mean Time the Prince of the Saracens, being inform'd of his Son's Success, march'd directly to Amorium, and, being joyn'd by the young Prince in his March, he laid close Siege to it. The Defendants supported themselves with a resolute Bravery, but the Emperor, doubtful of the Event, and earnestly desiring to preserve the City, sent a Messenger with very rich Presents to the Saracen, desiring him to desist: But the Prince, instead of being diverted from his Design, order'd the Messenger to be secur'd, that he might be a Witness of the Issue, and attack'd the Place more vigorously than before. Notwithstanding which the Defendants made a very obstinate Resistance, and had they not been betray'd by some among themselves, the Town had not so easily been taken. But Badiates, one of the Inhabitants, having upon some Discontent abjur'd the Christian Religion, embrac'd an advantageous Offer made him by the Infidels, inform'd 'em in which Part the Walls were weakest, and might be be most commodiously attack'd, whereupon ensu'd a miserable Slaughter of the Garrison and Inhabitants; for the Saracens, being enrag'd at their resolute Opposition, and the Loss they had sustain'd in the Siege, behav'd themselves with the utmost Cruelty. Most of the Men were put to the Sword, and all the Women and Children led into Captivity. The City, the most beautiful of all the East, and the Capital of Cilicia, was levell'd with the Ground, after which the Emperor's Messenger was in an insulting manner dismiss'd, with an Account of what had pass'd, to his Master.

which is taken and
destroy'd.

Theophilus was so sensibly touch'd with the Destruction of this Place, that he was seiz'd with an excessive Melancholy. However he resolv'd, if possible, to be reveng'd upon the Infidels, and sent Theodosius, a Patrician, into France to crave the Assistance of that Nation. But Theodosius dy'd by the way, and, in all probability, had he arriv'd at the French Court, his Negotiation would have been unsuccessful; for the French at that Time were too much embroil'd among themselves to be able to send any Assistance into the East. In the mean Time Theophilus grew so dejected as to abstain from Nourishment, drinking nothing but Snow-water, which threw him into a Dysentery that ended his Days. Finding the weak Condition he was in, he was carry'd in a Litter to Magnaura, where, having summon'd the Senate and chief Officers of the Empire to meet him, he exhorted 'em, in a most moving Speech, to continue faithful to his Wife and Son, and protect 'em from Treachery. They heard him with the greatest Sorrow, and vow'd to spend their Lives and Fortunes in the Service and Defence of his Family. After which, sinking under the Oppression of his Mind, and Distemper of his Body, he quitted this Life, having reign'd twelve Years, and almost four Months. Before his Death some about him, Enemies to the Worth of Theophobus, persuaded the Emperor that the late Revolt of the Persians

The Death
of Theo-
philus.

A. D.
842.

ans was contriv'd by him the better to favour his Ambitious Designs, and that if he had any regard to his Posterity, he ought not to survive him ; whereupon the infirm diffident Prince commanded his Head to be struck off, and brought to him, which the Moment he was expiring he touch'd with his Hand, and breath'd out his last with these Words, Thou art now no longer Theophobus, nor I Theophilus.

His Character.

This was the End of a Prince, who in many Things was to be admir'd, in few to be reprehended, unless his Enmity to the Worship of Images was a Fault in him. They who tax him with that, allow him to have been an exact Observer of Justice, and utter Enemy to Covetousness, and all sumptuous Superfluities, of which Cedrenus gives us a remarkable Instance. He saith, that observing from his Palace Wall a Ship of great Burden, and richly laden, entring the Port at Constantinople, he ask'd to whom the Cargo belong'd ; and when he was inform'd that his Empress Theodora was Mistress of it, he commanded both Ship and Cargo to be burnt, declaring, He would have his Wife know he was an Emperor, and no Merchant. he was a great Benefactor to the City of Constantinople, which he beautify'd with many magnificent Buildings, strengthen'd with new Walls, and purg'd from a great Company of Curtisans that practis'd daily in it. He dy'd in the second Year of Lothaire the Emperor, and fifteenth of Gregory, the fourth Pope of Rome, A. D. 842.

Theophilus, at his Death, had constituted Manuel and Theoctistus Tutors to his Son, who was then but six Years of Age ; but the Regency was vested in his Mother Theodora, who being an active ambitious Princess, and willing to perpetuate her Authority, took care to associate such with her Son as would humour him in his youthful Inclinations, encourage him in his Pleasures, and keep him insensible of the Pleasures of Power and Dominion, all which, in the issue, brought unspeakable Calamities to the State. Nor was this the only Thing in which she resembled Irene, but in her

Zeal

Zeal for Images. Women naturally are inclinable to Superstition, which gave Birth to those many Errors that crept into the Church. She expell'd John, the Patriarch of Constantinople, who she thought would oppose her Designs, and establish'd Methodius, a Monk, in his Place ; after which she industriously apply'd herself to the Restauration of Images, enforc'd the Observance of the Second Council of Nice, and rais'd a grievous Persecution against the Manichees in the East, which created an horrible Combustion in the Empire. The Officers she employ'd in the Inquisition acted with the greatest Cruelty, nailing some to Crosses, and making others die under unspeakable Torments. No less than an hundred thousand Persons were by these means destroy'd, which drove the rest into an obstinate Rebellion. For Carbeas, a Commander in the East, and a zealous Manichee, hearing how his Father had been ignominiously crucify'd, fled with four thousand Men of the same Persuasion over to the Saracens, to whom they open'd a Passage into the East, where, without Intermission, they committed all manner of Hostilities. Baronius his Account of this great Revolution in Matters relating to Religion, which he hath built upon the Authority of his infallible Authors, is too fabulous to deserve any room here. The reclaiming of those he calls Hereticks, was attended with no less Miracles than the Conversion of the Jews and Gentiles to Christianity in the early Days of the Gospel. Theodora spent the whole Time of her Administration, which continu'd for fourteen Years, in these Affairs of the Church, in the mean Time permitting the Enemies of the Empire to destroy whole Provinces, and suffering her Son to indulge himself in all the dissolute Pleasures his unrestrain'd Youth could prompt him to, or a luxurious Court afford. Notwithstanding which unhappy Artifice, the young Emperor, as he encreas'd in Years, so did he begin to be touch'd with a Desire to Rule, in which he was encourag'd by Bardas, Theodora's Brother, who thought he had not a sufficient Authority under his Sister's Administration, and promis'd himself mighty Advantages from a Turn of Affairs. He knew it impossible for him to succeed in his Designs so long as Manuel and Theoctistus continu'd near the Emperor's Person. It happen'd very unluckily that some Misunderstanding arose between those two Great Men, which Bardas, with much Dexterity, so artfully manag'd, that Manuel quitted the Court, and retir'd to a private Life, and this open'd a way to Theoctistus his Ruin. Bardas's chief Instrument, was the Emperor's School-Master, a very covetous, stubborn, arrogant Person, who had entertain'd an irreconcilable Aversion to Theoctistus, for that he oppos'd the young Prince, who had a Desire to prefer his unworthy Master to an Office, for which he was in no measure qualifi'd ; so that the School-Master, animated by Revenge, and supported by Bardas, continually alarm'd the Emperor with the Dangers he was to apprehend from Theoctistus, who had no less a Design than to marry either the Empress her self, or one of her Daughters, and pluck out his Eyes, thereby to make him incapable of the Empire. The young Prince easily believ'd whatever was offer'd against a Man, whom he fear'd rather than lov'd, and therefore resolv'd to destroy him. Accordingly he was seiz'd not long after by the Emperor's Order, and committed to Prison, in which within a few Days, by Virtue of the same Authority, he was put to Death.
not

A. D.     Theodora resented this Murder with a most extravagant Passion ; she ran up and down the Court with her Hair loose about her Shoulders, fill'd the Air with her Shrieks and Cries, curs'd both her Brother and her Son, and wish'd them an End equally as unfortunate. These Reproaches serv'd only to incense Bardas and the young Prince against her, so that they resolv'd to finish what they had begun in removing her. She, being sensible of their Design, was willing to spare 'em the Crime of shedding more Blood, and

*The Em-
press quits
the Court.*

and prepar'd to submit without any Resistance ; to which purpose she summon'd the Senate, to whom she gave an Account of what Condition the Treasury was in, told 'em what a frugal Mistress she had been, and what immense Riches she left to her Son. After which she resign'd her Power, and departed from the Court to the no small Satisfaction of Michael, who now found himself absolute, being freed from the disagreeable Restraint of a Mother and a Guardian. However, for fear she should attempt once more to reassume that Authority she had so easily quitted, by Bardas his Advice, he order'd her to be shaven, and thrust into a Nunnery, an Indignity she did not long survive.

Michael made use of his unlimited Authority to the Destruction of the State, and the Profusion of those Treasures his Mother's Frugality had hoarded up. He took a great Pride in imitating Nero, and was mighty ambitious of exceeding the rest of the World in the Excellency of driving a Chariot, in Singing, and playing upon all sorts of musical Instruments ; and copy'd that Original Monster so well as to be mighty skilful in all manner of Debaucheries, admitting none near his Person, but such as could share with him in his scandalous Exercises and Diversions, and those he preferr'd to the highest Employments ; among the rest he made choice of one Theophilus, the most scandalous of 'em all, whom he made Patriarch of Constantinople. This new Prelate, attended by a parcel of Priests, that were like himself, would in broad Day-light walk as in Procession through the Streets, exposing himself in a thousand Buffoonries, and committing such Insolencies as appear'd horrible to the sober and discreet part of the Inhabitants. In the mean time Ignatius, the legal Patriarch, who, upon the Death of Methodius, had been elected in the Year 847, continu'd to exercise his Patriarchal Function, being very much belov'd by the People, and highly scandaliz'd at the Indignities offer'd the Church.

Michael a degenerate Prince.

In

Glicas.

Bardas his great Power.The Romans overthrown by
the Sara-
cens.

In a short time the dissolute Prince had wasted all his Treasures, and was reduc'd even to an infamous Necessity, in which he was forc'd to sell or pawn whatever was of value in the Imperial Palace. Among the rest he melted down those famous Trees of Gold, which according to my Author, were made by a learn'd Bishop call'd Leo, in the late Emperor's Time, and were the Admiration of all that beheld 'em ; for among the Branches were dispers'd a number of Golden Birds, which, by the help of an Engine, fung very delightfully, to the great Surprize of the Spectators, who were no less agreeably frighten'd at the Roar of some Golden Lions effected by the same Artifice. Whilst the Emperor was thus wasting the Treasures of the Empire, Bardas rul'd in it as he pleas'd, being, as a Reward for his eminent Services, made Steward of the Household, and General of the Armies. Having rais'd a powerful Army he set out upon an Expedition against the Saracens, in which the Emperor accompany'd him, and after he had wasted a great part of Armenia minor, he fate down before one of the strongest Towns upon the Euphrates. The Saracens appear'd seldom upon the Walls, and made few or no Sallies ; by these means giving the Romans reason to imagine the Garrison was very thin, upon which Presumption they grew secure and careless ; but as they were at their Devotions on the Lord's Day the Infidels fall'd out upon 'em, and made so good a use of their Advantage, that the whole Army was routed, the Camp and all their Baggage taken, and the Emperor himself with much difficulty escap'd. This Defeat, which Manuel receiv'd in his Enemy's Dominions, was follow'd not long after by another in his own ; for the Saracens being, upon all Occasions, assisted by Charbeas and his Manichees, pierc'd with an Army, consisting of thirty thousand Men, into the Roman Territories ; and tho' the Emperor oppos'd 'em with no fewer than forty thousand Thracians and Macedonians, yet the Saracens, watching their Advantage, tage, fell upon him unawares, and put his whole Army to Flight.

These Calamities threw the Empire into the greatest Consternation imaginable, especially when some time after News was brought to Court that the Infidels were preparing for another Invasion. The Emperor order'd his Uncle Petronas to march with an Army of Thracians against them; for Bardas, discourag'd with the late Overthrows, or for that he had Business of greater Consequence to pursue at home, declin'd taking the Field in Person, and trusted all to the Conduct of his Brother. Petronas his good Fortune in this Campaign repair'd, in some measure, the Losses sustain'd in the former Engagements, for he surrounded the Saracens, cut off the Caliph himself, and his whole Army; and having taken his Son Prisoner, as he was retiring in great haste to Melitena, he return'd in Triumph to Constantinople, where the Emperor made him Captain of his Guards, and permitted Bardas to assume the Title and Dignity of Cæsar; which as it was what he had been long aiming at, so did he conclude he had but one Step more to the Throne, with the Hopes of which he daily flatterr'd his Ambition. His unbounded Power made him arbitrary in all his Actions, for he not only divorc'd himself from his Wife, against whom he alledg'd nothing that was able to justify such a Proceeding, but marry'd his own Daughter-in-Law: At which the good Patriarch, Ignatius, was so offended, that he refus'd to communicate with him as it was customary upon the Feast of the Epiphany; with which Bardas was so provok'd, that in a Synod, he had order'd to be held at Constantinople, he suborn'd several false Witnesses, who accus'd Ignatius of having murder'd his Predecessor Methodius, whose Memory was had in great Veneration by the People; whereupon he was depos'd, and clapp'd up into Prison, and Photius was elected in his Place, which gave occasion to a very dangerous Sedition in Constantinople.

A. D.

858.

Bardas
created Cæsar.

All this while the degenerate Emperor continu'd in his scandalous way of living, spending his Time in Races, and other ridiculous Amusements, consorting with none but the most profligate Wretches in his Dominions. Among these was one Gryllus, whom the Emperor, in his Frolicks, would call Patriarch, and having adorn'd him with the Patriarchal Habit, sent once for his Mother, who was not yet dead, to meet him, and as the unhappy Lady, who mistook him for the real Patriarch, fell on her Knees to crave his Blessing, the Villain discover'd himself, and with filthy obscene Gestures derided the deluded Princess, and was highly applauded for it by the Emperor. He was so extreamly addicted to Races that he interdicted the use of Beacons, at that time so necessary to inform the People of the Incursions of the Saracens, because, as he was once beginning his Race, a Beacon was set on Fire, at which he was extreamly afflicted lest the People, upon an Apprehension of the Danger, should be diverted from observing his great Dexterity in Riding. His Mother, before her Death, frequently advis'd him to beware of Basilus, who was his Successor, as of one who would be the Ruin of his Family; notwithstanding which he continu'd him in his Favour, advanc'd him to the greatest Employments of Honour and Profit, and at last declar'd him Cæsar, and his Companion in the Empire, having at first made way for his Advancement by the Murder of Bardas, who, as yet, govern'd in every respect without Controul.

A. D.
866.

The Saracens that had settled in Crete, as was before observ'd, extreamly infested the Coasts of the Empire, and having made a Descent they pierc'd into Thrace, where they committed many Outrages. Bardas thought he should do the State an extraordinary piece of Service, if he could restrain the Insolence of those Infidels, and drive 'em out of Crete. To this end he rais'd a very powerful Army, and persuaded the Emperor to honour the Expedition with his Presence.

The

The Army encamp'd in Phrygia, near the Banks of the River Mæander, where Bardas his Servants, either out of Design, or unadvisedly, pitch'd their Master's Tent upon a Hill over-looking that of the Emperor, which was plac'd below. This the Enemies of Cæsar took care to improve to his Prejudice, and easily persuaded the Emperor how much reason he had to be jealous of so insolent aspiring a Favourite. Whereupon Basilus and the rest had Orders to murder him, and is murder'd. which they executed on the first of April. The Soldiers were so offended at the Loss of their General, that a great Mutiny arose in the Army, and the Emperor escap'd with some Danger to Constantinople, where the thoughts of the Cretan Expedition were wholly laid aside, and the usual Entertainments of that luxurious Court restor'd. Bardas his Ruin introduc'd the Advancement of Basilus, whom Michael declar'd Cæsar, and his Associate in the Empire on the twenty sixth of May following. Basilus, tho' born in Macedonia, was an Armenian by Descent, and tho' Cedrenus gives him a noble Pedigree, yet the generality affirm he was born of very mean obscure Parents. At the sacking of Adrianople by Crumus, King of Bulgaria, Basilus, being then a Child, was led with his Parents into Captivity, where he continu'd 'till a Peace was concluded, at which Time he was exchang'd among other Prisoners. His first Office in Court was Master of the Horse, to which he was preferr'd by Bardas, who, when he observ'd how profuse the Emperor grew in his Favours to him, began to repent of what he had done, and apprehended a Rival in the Person of his Creature, and therefore he contriv'd his Destruction, which however was anticipated by his own. Basilus, being advanc'd by Michael to the Imperial Dignity, apply'd himself with great Industry, to the Management of Affairs, and behaving himself in every respect, with much Modesty and Meekness, he endeavour'd in all his Discourses to divert the Emperor from his dissolute Courses.

Basilus
declar'd
Cæsar and
the Emperor's Colleague;

and murders Michael.

A. D.
867.
Basilus.

Courses. But the unworthy Prince was so far from listening to his wholesome Counsels, that he contracted an Enmity to him, and prepar'd to destroy that Building he had just then rais'd, which hasten'd on his own Ruin ; for Basilus, being inform'd of what the Emperor and his impudent Parasites were designing against him, thought the readier way to secure his own Safety was to strike first, and therefore watching his Opportunity, one Day when the Emperor was in his Cups, he kill'd him, when he had reign'd upwards of five and twenty Years, in the twelfth Year of Lewis II. Emperor of the West, and tenth of Nicolas, Pope of Rome, An. Dom. 867.

Basilus, upon the Death of Michael, was acknowledg'd sole Emperor by the ready Consent of the Senate and the People. Knowing how profuse his Predecessors had been in disposing of the Publick Treasure, he made a severe Examination into the Accounts of the Revenue, and by Act of Senate it was ordain'd, That they who had been rewarded for frivolous and dishonest Services should refund all to the Treasury. Which Act, tho' very just in itself, he prudently mitigated, and was contented with a Restitution of half, which enabled him to make great Largeesses to the People, whereby he grew exceedingly popular, and gain'd an extraordinary Reputation for the Care he took in the Administring of Justice. It's reported of him that he once wept for Joy, and gave God Thanks, for that, upon a diligent Inquiry, no Person was found throughout the City, who had occasion to petition against his Officers, or complain of Oppression. And as he was very diligent in the Management of the State, so was he no less solicitous for the well ordering of his own Family. He had four Sons, and as many Daughters ; three of his Sons he created Cæsars, the fourth he design'd for the Church, and made all his Daughters Nuns.

Basilus
breaks the Power of the Manichees.

The Manichees had, from the beginning of the late Reign, done innumerable Mischiefs to the Empire. They were Masters of many strong Holds in the East, from whence they made their Inroads at Discretion, and never return'd without a considerable Booty. These People Basilus thought it his Duty to chastise, and, if possible, to disarm 'em. To that purpose he rais'd the best Army he could, and proceeded in an Expedition against them, which was attended with Honour and Success, for in a few Years he broke the Heart of that People, wasted all their Country, seiz'd on their fortify'd Towns and Castles, and either kill'd or took their most experienc'd and resolute Officers; for which extraordinary Services he triumph'd in great Pomp at Constantinople, where some Conspiracies, form'd against him, were prevented by a seasonable Discovery, and the Conspirators justly punish'd. After this he invaded Syria, being attended in this Expedition by his eldest Son Constantine, and having taken Cæsarea, the Metropolis of Cappadocia, he struck such a Terror in the Saracens, that many of their Governors were forc'd to submit, and assist him in the War against their own Nation. He took so many Prisoners in this Expedition that their Numbers grew dangerous, upon which Consideration he commanded a Multitude of 'em to be slain. The greatest part of his Reign was spent in these Wars against the Saracens, in which, for the most part, he had the Advantage; for he recover'd Crete from them, destroy'd their whole Navy, and so far humbled them, that they were contented to sit quiet at home, not daring to attempt any thing against the Romans. The same was his Fortune in Cilicia, and in the West, where he reliev'd Capua closely Besieg'd by the Infidels, and in a great measure drove 'em out of Italy. These his extraordinary Advantages made him belov'd at home, and fear'd and respected abroad. Notwithstanding which the African Saracens hop'd, by some worthy Exploit, to redeem the Honour of their Nation,

Nation, and accordingly fitted out a Fleet consisting of sixty Sail, with which they did great Mischief in the Ionian Sea.

A successful
Stratagem.

Against these the Emperor sent Nasar his Admiral, who set Sail with a very strong Fleet to Metbona, where his Men deserted in such great Numbers, that he was afraid to venture an Engagement, and sent the Emperor an Account of the Condition he was in, and how ill his Ships were mann'd. The Emperor, concern'd at so unexpected an Accident, had recourse to this Stratagem ; he took thirty Saracens at that Time Prisoners in Constantinople, and having so disguis'd 'em, as to have 'em thought to be some of his own Subjects, he commanded 'em to be whipp'd publickly in the Circus, and from thence sent 'em into Peloponnesus, where they were nail'd to Crosses, as if they had been the principal Authors of the Desertion. This Stratagem had the Effect desir'd, for it not only confirm'd such in their Duty as had continu'd in the Service, but so terrify'd those that had deserted, that they return'd to their Duty, and desir'd to be led against the Enemy. In the mean Time the Saracens were much elevated at this Delay in the Romans, and having in full Security, quitted their Ships, they were busied in plundering a-shore, when Nasar fell unexpectedly by Night on their Fleet, and either sunk, burnt, or took all their Vessels.

The Saracen Fleet
destroy'd.

The Satisfaction the Emperor receiv'd from these frequent Advantages was something allay'd by the Loss of Syracuse, which was besieg'd and taken by the Carthaginian Saracens, tho' the Emperor had mann'd out a strong Fleet to relieve it : For Adrian, the Patrician, who was sent to command it, arriv'd not time enough to its Assistance, for which Reason he was banish'd by the Emperor at his Return to Constantinople.

Basilus, at such Times as he was releas'd from the Cares of War, busied himself in building and repairing Churches, and beautifying the Imperial Palaces, which which he did at a prodigious Expence. Some have reflected upon him for building and dedicating so many Churches to the Honour of St. Michael, as if he had been prompted to it by the stings of his Conscience, thereby to expiate the Murder of his Predecessor Michael, his great Patron and Benefactor. 'Tis certain, that towards the latter end of his Reign, he grew diffident and superstitious, addicting himself to the Conversation of Monks, who impos'd on him by their legendary Fables and selfish Intrigues. His eldest Son Constantine being dead, he lamented his Loss with a very unbecoming Passion, and was inconsolable, saith Zonaras, 'till by the Assistance of a Monk call'd Theodorus Santabareus, reputed a Negromancer and Magician, he beheld a Spectrum, cloath'd in his Son's Shape, which met him on Horseback, and, after the Emperor had kiss'd and embrac'd it, vanish'd in an Instant. This, or some other extraordinary pieces of Service, render'd the Monk very powerful with the Emperor, who seldom did any Thing without his Advice or Approbation, but suffer'd himself to be most grossly abus'd and deluded by him, which gave Ground to many unhappy Divisions in the Court.

Constantine being dead, the Eyes of all were fix'd on Leo, the Emperor's second Son, who, being a generous wary Prince, was much offended at the Power Theodorus and his Accomplices had by their Arts obtain'd over the Emperor; of which the jealous Monk was quickly sensible, and therefore he resolv'd by some Artifice to destroy him. The Custom being for the Prince, when he attended his Father abroad, to go unarm'd; the Monk alarm'd him with the Dangers to which he pretended the Emperor lay expos'd, through the Practices of some designing Courtiers, especially whilst he was in the Field a Hunting, in which the Emperor took an uncommon Delight, for which Reason he advis'd him to arm himself privately, with some of his Followers, and be ready to op-

The Dangerous Craft of a Monk.

pose any Treason should be attempted against him. These Jealousies the Monk instill'd with so much Cunning into the pious Prince, that he readily inclin'd to his Advicé, and the next Time he attended his Father abroad he arm'd himself, and some of his most intimate Friends. In the mean Time the Monk hasten'd to the Emperor, and in great Consternation told him what manifest Danger attended him, that his Son had a Design against his Life, and was prepar'd, the next Time he went out to Hunt, to kill him in the Field, and that, if he took care to have him search'd, he would find him arm'd accordingly. The jealous Emperor receiv'd, with an easie Credulity, what the Monk had affirm'd with so much Confidence; and therefore having caus'd his Son to be search'd, and finding the Proofs visible against him, he committed him to close Prison, whither the Malice of the implacable Monk pursu'd him; for the Emperor, at his Instigation, had commanded his Eyes to be pluckt out, had not the Patriarch, and the Principal among the Nobility, interpos'd in his Behalf. All the honest Courtiers, and those who had a just Regard to the Welfare of the State, were highly concern'd at these Domestick Quarrels, and labour'd very earnestly for the Prince his Release; to which the Emperor would by no means condescend, 'till he had receiv'd undeniable Arguments of his Innocence, after which he restor'd him to his former Dignity, and continu'd him always near his Person. For Basilus finding his End approaching, took care to instil into his Son such Rules of Government, as might make him answer the Expectations of his People, and the high Dignity to which he was call'd. The Greek Historians commend him highly for his Care in this Particular, his Acts of Piety, and impartial Administration of Justice. The same Authors ascribe Leo's Release to the seasonable Mimickry of a Parrot, which being casually taught his Lesson by the repeated Condolements of some, who daily lamented the young Prince

his

his Condition in a Room where the Bird hung constantly up in a Cage, cry'd out, with reiterated Complaints, at a Time when the Emperor was entertaining some of the Nobility at a publick Collation in the same Apartment, Alas, my Lord Leo! which Accident added fresh weight to the former Applications his Friends had made in his Behalf. Basilius did not live long after his Son's Release, but dy'd of a Diarrhæa, according to some (tho' others affirm he was kill'd casually by a Stag) in the Nineteenth Year of his Reign, the Fifth of Charles the Gross, and Second of Stephen the Fifth Pope of Rome, A. D. 886. Basilius dies.

They who pretend that Leo, tho' receiv'd and esteem'd as the Son of Basilius, was in reality the Son of Michael, have no other Ground for their Assertion, but the Severity of his Restraint, which will have no weight, if we consider the just Provocations the Emperor thought he had to proceed with so much Rigour against him; how notwithstanding he releas'd him before his Death, and design'd him for his Successor, which it is not likely he would have done had he not been his own Son, since he had others to succeed him. Nor is it to be suppos'd his extraordinary Respect for the Memory of his Predecessor Michael could prevail with him to act so much to the Prejudice of his own Family; 'tis a Maxim altogether new, and unheard of among Princes, how just and generous soever they may be in their own Natures. Zonaras.

Basilius was a Man of a Spirit and Capacity much above his Birth and Education, which he made appear in many remarkable Instances throughout his Reign. He cautiously declin'd engaging himself in the Disputes of Religion, and thereby kept fair with the contending Parties, though he diligently labour'd to promote the Peace of the Church. His Care was in nothing more conspicuous than in his reforming and new modelling the Laws of the Empire, which had lost much of their Authority since the Days of Justinian, as well in the Eastern Empire, His Character.

pire, where the use of the Latin Tongue, in which they were compil'd, by degrees grew discontinu'd, as in the West, where they were suppress'd or restrain'd by the barbarous Nations, who had conquer'd Italy, and introduc'd their own particular Laws and native Customs. In short, it may be said of Basilus, that if he had obtain'd the Empire with as much Innocence, as he had govern'd it with Prudence and Moderation, he had deserv'd to have been remember'd among the best Emperors.

Leo V.

A. D.
886.

Basilus being dead, Leo was universally acknowledg'd Emperor. He had been declar'd such by his Father in the thirteenth Year of his Reign, immediately upon the Death of his elder Brother Constantine, and profited so much from his own private Readings, and his Father's Instructions, that he deservedly acquir'd the Surname of Philosophus. His first Care was to punish Theodorus the Monk, who had been the Author of so many Mischiefs towards the latter end of his Father's Reign. He first order'd him to be whipp'd in an ignominious manner, after which he sent him to Athens, from whence, after he had order'd his Eyes to be pluck'd out, he banish'd him into the East. He proceeded with equal Severity against Photius, Patriarch of Constantinople, who had not only declar'd openly in Favour of Theodorus, and given a beginning to several Contests betwixt the Eastern and Western Church, but was accus'd of having consulted with Theodorus how to advance one of his own Kinsmen to the Throne. Hereupon Photius was depos'd, and banish'd into Armenia, and the Emperor's own Brother Stephen was advanc'd to the Patriarchal Dignity. At the same Time he recall'd those Bishops, and other Ecclesiasticks, that had been banish'd by the Contrivance or Authority of Photius, and restor'd 'em to their former Dignities, and endeavour'd, as much as he was able, to obliterate the Memory of his Father's Ingratitude to Michael, whose Relicks he remov'd from the Monastery wherein they were re-

pos'd,

pos'd, and convey'd 'em in solemn Pomp to the Imperial City. The Beginning of this Emperor's Reign was render'd unhappily remarkable for a sudden Interruption of the Saracens, and a Fire which destroy'd great Numbers of Houses, together with several Publick Buildings at Constantinople. This was follow'd by fresh Commotions in Italy, occasion'd by the Treachery of Ajo, or Angæus, Duke of Beneventum, who, hearing of Basilus his Death, fell suddenly upon the Emperor's Lieutenant, who commanded in those Parts that continu'd subject to the Byzantine Empire, and having overthrown him in two or three Engagements, forc'd the Inhabitants to renounce their Allegiance to the Emperor, and declare for him. As soon as Leo was inform'd of this Revolt he sent Constantine, the Patrician, with a strong Army into Italy, where he receiv'd an absolute Defeat, and was constrain'd to return from whence he came.

The Year following there happen'd such an Eclipse of the Sun, that the Stars appear'd at Noon-day, and this was attended with such terrible Thunders and Lightning as threw the Inhabitants of Constantinople, where several were destroy'd, into a general Consternation. Leo had been marry'd in the Year 879 to Theophania, the Daughter of Martinacius, a Lady of a most exemplary Piety, for which reason Leo had her canoniz'd, and erected a Temple in Honour of her Memory after her Death; tho' whilst she was alive, and sometime after his Advancement to the Throne, he forc'd Zoe, the greatest Beauty of that Age, from the Arms of one to whom she had been marry'd, and us'd her as his Concubine, conferring new and unheard of Honours upon her Father; who, abusing the Power he had with the Emperor, gave a beginning to the War between the Romans and Bulgarians. There had been a great Trade carry'd on between the two Nations for a considerable Time, and the Publick Mart was kept at Constantinople, from whence some of the Greek Merchants

A War
with the Bulgari-
ans.

persuaded Zantzas, the Father of Zoe, to remove it, by Virtue of the Authority he had in the Court, to Thessalonica; where the Officers who were employ'd to collect the Emperor's Customs, acted with an unusual Vigour, and oppress'd the Bulgarians with unlawful Impositions: Of which when Complaint was made to Simeon, the Prince of that Nation, who had long wanted a Pretence for a Rupture, he requir'd, by his Ambassadors, immediate Satisfaction from the Emperor; who, depending too much upon Zantzas his Suggestions, refus'd to redress those who had been so unjustly oppress'd, and by that means supply'd Simeon with a fair Opportunity of declaring War against him. In the first Engagement, which happen'd in Macedonia, the Romans receiv'd a total Defeat, great Numbers of 'em were slain upon the Place, and more taken Prisoners, who were us'd in a barbarous manner by the insolent Conqueror, for he first led 'em in Triumph round his Camp, after which he cut off their Noses, and sent 'em to Constantinople, where they fill'd the Inhabitants at once with Shame, Anger and Amazement. Leo was highly provok'd at this Indignity, and therefore prevail'd with the Hungarians to invade Simeon on one side, whilst he assaulted him on the other. The Hungarians, being encourag'd by the rich Presents they had receiv'd from the Emperor, were easily persuaded to undertake the Expedition, and therefore prepar'd in great Numbers to break into Bulgaria. Leo on the other Hand fitted out a strong Fleet, and having rais'd a new Army, he committed it to the Conduct of Nicephorus Phocas, a Patrician, and Captain of the Guards; but being still more desirous of Peace, than the continuance of a War, to which he had given an unhappy Beginning; at the same Time that the Army began to march, he sent an Ambassador to Simeon with Proposals for an Accommodation. Simeon, who observ'd the Powers that were drawing down on each side against him, thought this a Trick of the Emperor's on purpose pose to amuse and circumvent him; so that having thrown the Ambassador into Prison he march'd in Person against the Hungarians, who had pass'd the Ister, and were destroying Bulgaria with Fire and Sword. The Hungarians receiv'd him with great Courage, and, after an hot Dispute on both sides, totally overthrew him. The Flower of all his Army was cut off, and he escap'd with great hazard to Drista, whilst the Hungarians pursu'd those of his Forces that fled, of whom they took great Multitudes Prisoners, and sold 'em for a good Sum of Money to the Emperor. This Misfortune had taught Simeon to act with a little more Moderation, for observing that the Emperor's Forces, under the Conduct of Nicephorus, were approaching, he sent and earnestly desir'd Peace from Leo, who as readily granted it, and gave Orders for his Fleet and Army to return home.

Simeon,
King of Bulgaria,
beaten by
the Hun- garians.

Simeon no sooner found the Danger remov'd but he threw Leo's Ambassadors into Prison, and fell with an unexpected Fury upon the Hungarians, whom he defeated, and in a barbarous manner ravag'd all their Country; and when the Emperor, who was unable to assist his Confederates upon so short a Warning, complain'd of this Proceeding, and demanded a Ratification of the Treaty, he arrogantly declar'd he would by no means condescend to a Peace 'till all the Bulgarians, who had been taken Prisoners, were releas'd; this the Emperor, after some Hesitation, consented to, notwithstanding which Simeon would not consent to lay down his Arms, but insisted on new Demands more unreasonable than the former; at which Leo was so incens'd that he resolv'd to fall upon him with the whole Power of the Empire, and, if possible, to destroy him. Some Misunderstanding between the General Officers, occasion'd by the Intrigues of Zantzias, who govern'd with too unlimited an Authority in the Court, destroy'd the hopes of this Expedition; for Simeon fell upon the Romans whilst they were at Variance among themselves, and obtain'd obtain'd an entire Victory over 'em, which constrain'd the Emperor at length to consent to a Peace upon the best Terms he could obtain, which however was observ'd no longer than it was judg'd beneficial either to the one side or the other, and the War was carry'd on with various Success between both Nations during all this Emperor's Reign. For notwithstanding all his great Care and Vigilance, the Bulgarians watch'd all Opportunities of insulting the Empire.

Whilst Leo was engag'd in these Wars abroad, several Designs were form'd against his Person at home, which however were seasonably discover'd, and the Traitors deservedly punish'd, tho' once he escap'd with great Hazard of his Life. For going in a solemn Procession to Church on Whitsunday, as it was customary upon that Festival, a Fellow watch'd his Opportunity, and gave him so great a Blow on his Head, that all about him despair'd of his Life. The Fellow was immediately seiz'd and tortur'd, in order to force him to a Discovery, but all they could do could extort nothing from him; 'tis true he was look'd on as distemper'd in his Brain, which it's thought put an end to any further Scrutiny. Indeed Alexander, the Emperor's Brother, was mistrusted to have given Life to all these Conspiracies, notwithstanding which Leo made no Enquiry against him, either for that he had then no Son of his own to succeed him, or because, being a Man of no Merit or Esteem, he thought it beneath his Worth to apprehend any Danger from him.

A. D.
901.
Several Conspiracies dis-
cover'd.

Leo marries Zoe
his Concu-bine.

Some time before this, Leo, having bury'd his Empress Theophania with much Pomp, marry'd Zoe his beautiful Concubine, and put the Imperial Crown on her Head. She enjoy'd not those Honours long, but dy'd within two Years after her Advancement, and was succeeded by a Woman of a Beauty equal to her own, nam'd Eudocia, who dying in Child-bed not very long after, left the Emperor once more a Widower. As yet he had no Son to succeed him, at which he was very uneasie, but being, according to the Custom of those Times, addicted to Astrology, he was assur'd he should still be the Father of a Successor, which encourag'd him to look out for another Wife, and was easily persuaded to marry a second Zoe, by whom he had a Son call'd Constantine. The fourth Marriage, which was then held unlawful, gave Ground to several unhappy Divisions in the Eastern Church. For as soon as Leo had declar'd Zoe Empress, which was not 'till her Son Constantine was born, Nicholaus Mysticus, at that time Patriarch of Constantinople, not only declar'd himself resolutely against it, but excommunicated the Emperor, who when he obstinately refus'd, upon Leo's earnest Application, to restore him to the Church, he depos'd him from his Office, and substituted Euthymius in his Place. Nicholaus would not have carry'd himself with so much Obstinacy, if he had not been supported by the Opinions, and Declarations of several other Bishops his Suffragans, who adhered stedfastly to him in his Expulsion, whereas others, who were of a more peacable Temper, approv'd of the new Patriarch's Dispensation in the Emperor's Behalf, whereupon a Schism ensu'd in the Church.

was

A Schism in the Eastern Church. The Saracens infect the Empire.

The Nuptial Ceremonies were hardly over before the Emperor was alarm'd by the Motions of the Saracens, who, encourag'd at the Hostilities and Success of the Bulgarians, first mann'd out a Fleet, with which they took Taurominium in Sicily, and having slain a great Multitude of the Romans they conquer'd Lemnos, from whence they led away an incredible Number of Captives. After this they did great Mischiefs without controul upon the Coasts under the Conduct of a Renegado, call'd Leo Attaleus, who put the Imperial City it self into a great Consternation. The Emperor prepar'd all the Strength he had at Sea to oppose 'em, but his Admirals finding 'em always superior in Number, return'd without attempting any thing against 'em, and left 'em to besiege Thessalonica, which they

They cunning Intrigues of a Saracen Favourite.

they took and plunder'd, and had destroy'd the City had they not been bought off with a vast Sum of Gold. Leo, after these Disgraces at Sea, where he found himself unable to contend with the Infidels, thought it not improper to make some Reprisals upon 'em by Land; and having rais'd a very powerful Army he gain'd several Victories against 'em in the East, under the Conduct of Eustathius Argyrus, and Andronicus Ducas: And had not some fatal Dissentions put a stop to the Progress of his Arms, he had infallibly obtain'd as great or greater Advantages against 'em than any of his Predecessors. Samonas, a Saracens by Birth, having discover'd some dangerous Designs form'd against the Emperor, was, by Advice of the Senate, as well as by Leo's particular Inclinations to his Person, advanc'd to Employments of the highest Trust and Profit. He made an outward formal Profession of Christianity, but inwardly nourish'd the Poison with which he was infected at his Birth, and having in a prodigious manner enrich'd himself, he attempted to escape with all his Wealth into his own Country; but after several Accidents upon the Road was stopp'd, and brought back to Constantinople by Constantinus Ducas, the Son of the General Andronicus. The Emperor, notwithstanding his intended Defection, restor'd him upon a specious Submission to his Favour, and, continuing him in Offices, left it in his Power to revenge himself upon those who had forc'd him back. Shortly after this Accident Himerius and Andronicus Ducas were declar'd Generals against the Saracens; and Samonas having conceiv'd an implacable Hatred to Andronicus, upon the Account of his Son Constantine, prevail'd with one of the Generals, his most intimate Friend, to advise him by Letter by no means to join with Himerius in any Enterprize against the Saracens, for that Himerius had Orders from the Emperor to put out his Eyes as soon as he could get him into his Power. Andronicus unhappily listen'd to these Insinuations, and suffer'd Himerius to engage without him, notwithstanding standing which the Saracens were totally defeated. This Success against the Infidels at once reminded Andronicus of his Duty, and the Error he had committed; so despairing of a Pardon from the Emperor he seiz'd on a Castle near Iconium, where he prepar'd for a Revolt, whilst Samonas was using all the Power he had at Court to his Destruction, representing to Leo, with all the Force his Malice was Master of, How contumaciously he refus'd to join with Himerius in the Expedition, and was now ripe for a Rebellion. Tho' Leo was unwilling to believe any thing to the Prejudice of Andronicus, who had hitherto serv'd him with much Honour and Integrity, yet being ignorant of Samonas his wicked Artifice, and reflecting on the Generals late Behaviour, he commanded a strong Army to be sent against him, whereupon Andronicus fled with all he had to the Saracens, by whom he was receiv'd with all imaginable Kindness and Respect.

Leo, as soon as the heat of his Resentment was over, began to reflect on what he had done. He could not be ignorant of the Reasons Samonas had to act with so much Vigour against Andronicus, and regretted at once the good Subject his Credulity had lost, and what an Enemy he had rais'd up in his stead, and resolv'd, if possible, to recal him. Accordingly he releas'd a Saracen Captive, on Condition he would carry some Letters from him to Andronicus; the Saracen readily undertook the Service, but being brib'd by Samonas, instead of conveying 'em to Andronicus, he deliver'd the Letters to the Caliph, wherein he invited him home, promis'd to restore him to his former Dignity and Estate, and gave him all imaginable assurance of fresh Encouragement. The Caliph having read the Letters immediately threw Andronicus and his Friends into Prison, where they were treated with all imaginable Severity, under which Andronicus miserably perish'd; others abjur'd their Religion for the sake of their Liberty, to which,
after

after many Hardships, they were restor'd ; and the rest, with exceeding difficulty, escap'd to Constantinople, with Constantine, Andronicus his Son, of whom the Reader may expect a farther Account hereafter.

Leo's
causeless Jealousies.

Whatever Grounds Leo had for his Proceedings against Andronicus, it doth not appear, but the Jealousie he had conceiv'd against Eustathius Agryrus was even more unwarrantable. Eustathius had given the Emperor, and several of his Predecessors, frequent Instances of his great Integrity and Conduct in many Services both by Sea and Land, notwithstanding which, without any apparent Crime urg'd against him, he was turn'd out of all his Employments on a sudden, and was not suffer'd long to enjoy the Sweetness of a private Life, being shortly after taken off by Poison, to the great Dissatisfaction as well of the Seamen as the Soldiers, by whom he was universally belov'd. The Behaviour of Leo, in these Particulars, shows us how unhappy some Princes are in the Choice of their Favourites. And 'twas equally as difficult for any one to find out a Reason for the Misfortune of these two Great Men, as for the extraordinary Favours, notwithstanding all his Perfidious Intrigues, continu'd to Samonas, who was grown into so great a Credit with the Emperor, that he sent for the Favourite's Father, entertain'd him in the Imperial Palace, and out of a religious, but dangerous Vanity, show'd him all the rich Furniture and Treasure of the Church. The old Man was so charm'd at the Power and Authority with which he saw his Son govern in Constantinople, that he would willingly have staid there, and been Partaker with him in it, had not Samonas persuaded him to continue stedfast in his Religion, which he never had renounc'd from his Heart, and return into his own Country, whither he intended to follow him with the first Opportunity. The Father being gone, the Emperor grew every Day more profuse in his Favours to his Son, 'till by degrees he grew, as it were, intoxicated with too much Power, and by that mean means procur'd his own Ruin. Samonas had recommended a young Gentleman, call'd Constantine, by Birth a Paphlagonian, to wait on the Empress, who was so much taken with him, that she made use of all her Interest to promote him, which administer'd great Cause of Distrust to Samonas, who began to fear he might be supplanted. At first he endeavour'd by the strength of his Authority, to remove him, but when he found that could not be effected, he arrogantly accus'd the Empress of too much Familiarity with him, and proceeded so far as to publish a Scurrilous Libel against the Emperor himself; who, finding him to be the Author of it, grew at length sensible of his Perfidiousness, and after he had order'd him to be shaven he confin'd him to a Monastery, and preferr'd the new Favourite to be Chamberlain of the Household in his stead.

Samonas in Disgrace.

Leo did not long survive this piece of Justice, but dy'd of the Cholick on the eleventh of May, or June, as some will have it, in the second Year of Anastasius the Third Pope of Rome, the last of Lewis the Fourth, Emperor of Germany, and twenty fifth of his own Reign, by the Consent of most Authors, tho' some of others vary from it, An. Dom. 911.

Leo dies. A. D. 911.

Leo is generally allow'd to have been a vigilant and prudent Prince, a Man of great Learning and Capacity in the Administration of Affairs, tho' there can be no one but must allow him in many things to be blameable. Undoubtedly his extraordinary Learning render'd him a Favourite among Men of Letters, especially the Church-Men, who compare him to the most vigilant of their Bishops in his Care of the Church, express'd in his Circular Letter, and other of his Writings. His prudent Management towards the Italian Princes, by which he won several of 'em off from their Alliances with the Saracens, who were grown very powerful in the West, and uniting 'em into a joint Confederacy against 'em, shows him to be an able Statesman and provident provident Guardian of the Christians. His Son being little more than five Years old at his Death, he declar'd Alexander, his Brother, his Successor, adjuring him, by all the Ties of Gratitude and Nature, to be careful of the young Prince his Education, and appoint him to succeed in the Empire, which, in all appearance, he would hardly have done, had Alexander been then no more than twenty Years of Age, as some of the Greek Writers have affirm'd; tho' Eutropius, from whom the rest have borrow'd, and by that means fell into the same Error with him, forgot his former Account, in which he tells us that Basilius the Emperor, in the third Year of his Reign, created his third Son Alexander Cæsar, which being true, it follows of necessity that he could not be less than forty Years of Age at Leo's Death.

His Character.

---

C H A P. II.

From the Death of Leo the Philosopher, to that of Basilius the Second, who subdu'd the Bulgarians, and made 'em Tributary to the Empire.

Containing the Space of 114 Years.

I. IT was very happy for the State that the Reign Alexander of Alexander, whom Leo had appointed his Successor, was so short; in which however he had Time enough to give the World a terrible Idea of a wicked dissolute Prince; and tho' he was quick in his Course, yet, like a malignant Planet, he shed his poisonous Influence as he roll'd along. He was scarce confirm'd in the Empire before he recall'd Nicolaus Mysticus, whom his Brother had banish'd, and in a publick Assembly, summon'd for that purpose, formally depos'd Euthymius, the Patriarch; who was no sooner degraded, but some Hot-headed Priest of Nicolaus his Faction fell violently upon the helpless Old Man, and, in a most outrageous manner, insulted him, pulling him by his hoary Beard, buffetting him with their Fists, and committing such barbarous Indignities upon his sacred Person, as would scarce be allow'd even in a Representation upon the Stage, and at which the Ambassadors of the Saracens themselves, who were then present, to the great Scandal of Christianity, were highly offended. Euthymius did not long survive this Barbarity, but dy'd shortly after in Exile.

Alexander having, as he thought, by this Action settled the Affairs of the Church, apply'd himself with equal Prudence, to the Management of the State, out of which he thrust all those whose Honour and Integrity had render'd them unwelcome to him, advancing such in their room as would countenance, and share with him in his libidinous Courses. He was sensible that these Proceedings had render'd him odious to the People, whose Eyes and Wishes were fix'd on his Nephew Constantine, whom therefore he design'd to castrate, and thereby render him incapable of the Succession, which he propos'd to settle on a Debauchee, call'd Basilitzas, a Fellow of obscure Birth and Fortune, 'till enobled by him for being his Companion in all his abominable Extravagancies. Those who were near his Person, and bore any Respect to the Memory of Leo, perswaded him to suspend the Execution of his Design for some Time, in Consideration that the Child was young and sick, and would shortly, in all probability, be call'd out of the way by a natural Death, which would save him the Expence of so unpopular an Attempt. The hopes of that, and an assurance that the Prince was yet too young to raise any Disturbances against him, restrain'd him for the present from his bloody Purpose.

Zeo, the Mother of Constantine, had, from the Death of Leo, very vigorously endeavour'd to oppose Alexander, at which being provok'd, by the Advice of his new Ministers, he banish'd her from the Court, where none were suffer'd but those who were of as brutish Appetites as himself. And that his Transactions abroad might bear a Resemblance to those at home, he dismiss'd, in an ignominious manner, the Ambassadors of the Bulgarians, who were come to renew the League formerly concluded; whereupon the War broke out afresh between both Nations, and prov'd, in the Issue, very unfortunate to the Romans.

Thus had this unfortunate Prince, in less than a Year's Time, reduc'd the State to the last Extremity; being hated at home, where he was serv'd by none but such as were Slaves to his sensual Pleasures; and despis'd abroad, where his Enemies, justly provok'd against him, were arming for his Destruction. All those, who were able or willing to serve their Country

try in so dangerous a Conjunction, were disgrac'd and banish'd, and the sole Management of Affairs committed to the Hands of those who seem'd to desire its Destruction. All this while he pursu'd with great Application his dissolute Courses, laughing at the sacred Orders of the Church, blaspheming God, and oppressing Man; 'till Death hasten'd on by his Intemperance, releas'd the State from so pernicious a Monster, and took him off in the midst of his Debaucheries. Having one Day exercis'd himself at Tennis, after a great fit of Gluttony, he play'd with so much Violence, that he broke some of the Vessels, and continu'd to bleed inwardly 'till he dy'd. Before his Death he declar'd his Nephew Constantine his Successor, but appointed those for his Governors, during his Minority, as had in his Life-time been his most darling Companions, all which however were shortly after remov'd by Zoe, the young Emperor's Mother, whom they were forc'd much against their Wills, to recal to Court.

Alexander dies.

A. D. 912.

Alexander's sudden Death, and the Contempt the generality of the People had for those who were assign'd for the young Prince his Governors, encourag'd some, who were Friends to Constantine Ducas, the Son of Andronicus, to aim at an Innovation. Ducas was at that Time absent, but was quickly advertis'd by his Friends of Alexander's Death. They reminded him of the dangerous Condition the State was in, threaten'd from abroad, and divided at home, that in the mean Time the Empire wanted a Head to govern and protect it, that it would infallibly be dissolv'd if he did not appear in its behalf, and by a timely Defence prevent the Ruin that attended it, there being no Man living fit to govern but himself. Leo, the late Emperor, is said to have admonish'd Ducas of his Duty upon his Return to Constantinople, which was before observ'd; And to have advis'd him, notwithstanding the Encouragement he might receive from his Name, never to aim at the Sovereignty; That if he contented himself with a private State, in which he, was born, he might live long and happy ; but if ever he attempted the Imperial Dignity, that very Place, where now he was treated with so much Honour and Magnificence, would inevitably be the Scene of his Destruction. Constantinus Ducas either had forgot this friendly Admonition, or disregarded it. He gave a ready Ear to the dangerous Invitations of his unhappy Friends, and hasten'd by Night, with a select Body of Men to Constantinople, and being got into the Castle summon'd all his Friends to attend him. Many there were of great Power and Authority in the City that answer'd his Summons, and repair'd to the Castle ; from whence, after a few Hours spent in some previous Consultations, they went in a great Multitude, with Torches in their Hands, before it was Light, to the publick Circus, and with joyful Acclamations saluted him Emperor.

Constantine VI.

Constantinus Ducas sets up for himself,

and is slain.

The young Emperor's Governors had quickly an Account of this dangerous Tumult, and sent John, who was one of the Number, at the Head of some Seamen, and such others as were the most forward to defend the Prince, with Orders to oppose the Ufurper, who met with little or no Opposition 'till he got to the Court of Guard, where the Soldiers, being encourag'd by John's Approach, made a very vigorous Resistance. Gregory, the Son of Ducas, and some others of his most intimate Friends were slain at the first Onset ; and shortly after Ducas himself being thrown from his Horse as he was encouraging his Men, who began to give Ground, was seiz'd by some of the Imperial Guards, who cut off his Head, and presented it to the Emperor. With Ducas fell the Life and Hopes of all his Party, the Principal of whom were punish'd either by Death or Banishment. This unexpected Insurrection, so happily crush'd in its Birth, gave the young Prince his Governors a fair Pretence of calling such of the Senators to an Account, who were too honest to approve of their Behaviour viour in their Authority; and 'tis thought many of that Rank, tho' innocent, had suffer'd, had not one of the Judges, more courageous than the rest, boldly ask'd 'em, How they durst attempt Things of so high a Nature during the Emperor's Minority?

In the midst of these Domestick Distractions Simeon, King of Bulgaria, being justly provok'd at the Indignities put upon his Ambassadors by Alexander, had, with a very powerful Army invaded the Empire, and was by this Time advanc'd so near to Constantinople, that he had great hopes of taking it; but met with so vigorous a Reception from the Inhabitants, who trusted not so much to their Walls, tho' they were very strong, as their own Courage, that after several unsuccessful Attempts he was forc'd to retire, and offer some Overtures for a Treaty, which were very willingly embrac'd by the Governors, and the Matter was carry'd on so far, that Simeon was admitted to Dine with the Emperor, who receiv'd him very honourably, and dismiss'd him laden with rich Presents. Notwithstanding which the Treaty was either broke before it could be brought to an happy Conclusion, or the Peace violated soon after. For by that Time the Empress Zoe had been recall'd to Court, and confirm'd in her Authority, Simeon broke once more into Thrace, and destroy'd all with Fire and Sword, continuing long in no Place 'till he arriv'd at Adrianople, which he resolv'd to take either by Force of Arms, or the Power of his Presents. The latter prov'd the more prevalent, for it was betray'd to him by one Pancratucas, an Armenian, who had been corrupted by Gold to that purpose, and was afterwards, by the same means, recover'd to the Emperor.

The Bulgarians invade the Empire,

Whilst Zoe was thus attack'd on' one Side by the Bulgarians, the Saracens from Tyre infested the Maritime Parts of the Empire on the other; whereupon she consulted with the Senate what was to be done in such an Extremity; in which it was resolv'd to and the Saracens.

make Peace, if possible, with the Saracens, and direct the whole Power of the Empire against the Bulgarians. The Saracens being divided among themselves at home, and satisfy'd for the present with their late Depredations, readily agreed to an Accommodation; so that Zoe being now disintangled from them, sent Leo Phocas at the Head of a very gallant Army against the Bulgarians. Leo muster'd his Army at Diabasis, being a capacious Plain, and fit for such a Purpose. He found the Troops in as good a Condition as he could desire, very well disciplin'd, and eager to be led against the Enemy, to which they had been encourag'd by a late Donative from the Empress. Here the great Chaplain of the Palace, having first made 'em all kneel down, and swear to fight it out to the last, in a solemn manner gave him his Benediction. The General Officers were Men most of 'em eminent for their former Services, and great Experience in the War, so that Leo, with great reason, promis'd himself Success in his Expedition. Both Armies engag'd on the sixth of August, and the Battel was fought with great Resolution on both Sides, 'till at length the Valour of the Romans prevail'd, and the Bulgarians after a great Loss, were put to Flight. It happen'd that Leo, grown faint and thirsty through the great Fatigues of Battel, in which he had equall'd the Labour of the most ordinary Soldier, alighted at a Fountain to refresh himself during the Pursuit; and whilst he stoop'd down to drink, the Horse, eas'd of his Rider, broke loose and ran in among the Ranks of the Army; where being known by the Soldiers they all concluded their General was slain, whereupon most of 'em, in a disorderly manner, turn'd their Pursuit into a Flight. The Disorder this unhappy Mistake had created in the Roman Army was quickly perceiv'd by Simeon, who, having retreated in an orderly manner, immediately rally'd his Forces, and turn'd the Fortune of the Day.

A. D.

917.

The Romans are defeated by the Bulgarians.

To

To this Mistake some attribute the Miscarriage of the Imperial Army, tho' others assign a more weighty Reason for it. They say that whilst Leo was busily employ'd in pursuit of the Enemy, he receiv'd Intelligence that Romanus Lacapenus, a Man of great Authority in the Empire, and Admiral of the Fleet, which had Orders to hover about the Sea-Coasts, and assist Leo if need requir'd, was return'd back to Constantinople with a Design to usurp the Imperial Power, whilst most of the Great Men were absent from the City; at which Leo, who had the same Design in View, was so nearly concern'd, that he return'd on a sudden into the Camp, the better to be inform'd of the Truth; and by that means the Soldiers, who imagin'd it to be done out of Fear, were so discourag'd that they turn'd their Backs, and gave a new Turn to the Fortune of the Day. This seems to be the most probable Account, if we consider the Actions both of the one and the other shortly after.

Leo was descended from some of the former Emperors; he was a Man of great personal Merit, and many considerable Employments, besides his Interest at Court was very strong by the means of Constantine the Chamberlain, his Wife's Brother. Depending therefore too much upon his own Strength, and the Emperor's Minority, he grew so confident of raising himself one Day to his projected Greatness, that he openly declar'd his Title to the Imperial Dignity. Romanus on the other Hand, had ingratiated himself by a long series of Services render'd to the Emperor and his Father, tho' it appear'd afterwards that all his Designs in private were to the Advancement of himself and Family. Theodore, the Emperor's School-Master, had diligently examin'd into Leo's Actions, and, upon good Grounds, foresaw the Danger his Pupil was in, and perswaded him to strengthen himself against him by the Assistance of Romanus, whom he advis'd him to chuse for his Protector.

lector. Romanus at first, with great Obstinacy, refus'd to accept the Charge, 'till he was invited to it by the Emperor's own Letters, and Leo's ambitious Practices, whom he would not suffer to hasten with more speed to the Sovereignty than himself, so that at last he privately undertook to frustrate the Attempts of Leo and his Adherents.

These Negotiations were not manag'd with so much Secresie, but Constantine the Chamberlain had Intimation of it. Notwithstanding which he presum'd so much upon his Power, that he ventur'd to go shortly after to the Fleet with the Treasure assign'd for the Payment of the Seamen, where Romanus, by a plausible Carriage having gotten him into the Snare, immediately seiz'd and confin'd him. This Accident made so great a Noise in the City, that nothing less than a Revolt was expected; and when Zoe sent to know the meaning of these Proceedings, and to require the Chamberlain to be set at Liberty, she receiv'd no other Answer than that all was owing to Leo's ill Management in the Army, and Constantine the Chamberlain's Behaviour at Court.

*Zoe, the Emperor's
Mother, re-mov'd from
the Government.*

Shortly after this the Emperor re-call'd the Patriarch, and some others, whom his Mother at the beginning of her Administration, had remov'd; and tho' she very importunately desir'd the contrary, remov'd her from the Management, and so more openly expos'd himself to the Designs of those who were preparing to oppress him. Leo was turn'd out of all his Employments, together with all such as were related to him. Whereat being justly alarm'd, and dreading what might follow, he went privately to Romanus, and in a most moving manner lamented the Straits to which he was reduc'd. Romanus, being sensible how considerable a Man Leo was, as well in regard of his personal Interest as powerful Alliances, chose rather to soften and encourage him with fair Promises for the present, than offend and exasperate him before his own Designs were ripe for Execution. Upon which which Consideration he receiv'd him with a great deal of outward Respect, and a League of Friendship was contracted between 'em, which was to be strengthen'd by an intended Inter-Marriage of their Children.

Romanus having thus, in a great measure, as he thought, disarm'd Leo, and purg'd the Court of such as were averse to his Proceedings, he went thither himself to answer, as he pretended, the Crimes that had been urg'd against him, and to prove that he had done nothing but what consisted with the Safety of the State, and the Security of the Emperor, which had been so apparently threaten'd by Leo's Faction; when that was done he solemnly oblig'd himself, under the most dreadful Imprecations, never to attempt any thing against the Emperor's Person or Dignity, but hazard his Life for the Preservation of both. Romanus behav'd himself in all these Transactions with so much outward Integrity, that the young Prince was easily persuaded to marry his Daughter Helena, and confer on him the Title of Father to the Emperor; after which he made his Son Christopher Commander in chief of the Associates, which at that time was esteem'd one of the highest Dignities in the Empire.

Constantine marries Romanus his Daughter.

These extraordinary Favours to Romanus provok'd Leo, who had for a long time been a Male-content, to break out into an open Rebellion, which it was the Favourite's Interest as well as Duty to crush in its Birth. Leo, being assisted by the Chamberlain, and some others of great Interest in the State, gave out in his publick Declarations, that what he did was in behalf of the Emperor, whom he endeavour'd to free from the Power and Authority of Romanus; which plausible Pretence seduc'd many to declare for him, and had not Romanus taken Care to have the Emperor's Letters, wherein he acknowledg'd Romanus his Father, and declar'd Leo a Traitor, and an Enemy to him and his Family, produc'd in the Camp, he had, in all probability, probability, created great Troubles in the Empire. But when the Chief Officers, and others, that were with Leo, found the Letters sign'd by the Emperor himself, and seal'd with his own Seal, they withdrew from Leo, and return'd to their Duty. They were shortly after follow'd by the rest of the Army, so that Leo was forc'd to fly and secure himself in a Castle call'd Atcas, where he was shortly after taken Prisoner, and had his Eyes pluck'd out, whereby he was render'd incapable of any further Innovations.

Κρηγο-
ριος ὁ Μαγιστρός.

Romanus had hardly remov'd the Dangers that were threaten'd him by an open Rebellion, before he had like to have been taken off by a private Conspiracy, carry'd on by some who under-hand had favour'd Leo's Attempts; but having declin'd declaring publicly for him they escap'd the Punishment, tho' they still preserv'd the Spirit of the Party. Among these were Michael, the Master of the Ordonance, who had perswaded several young Men to attempt to kill him as he went out to Hunt. Tho' the Conspirators thought the thing was manag'd with all imaginable Privacy, yet was it happily discover'd to Romanus, who, having pluck'd out all their Eyes, led 'em in an ignominious manner about, having order'd Leo to be expos'd with them as a Companion, as well in their Crime as Punishment. Romanus his Jealousies were so alarm'd by these Attempts, that he proceeded in a severe manner against all those on whom he could fix the least Suspicion. Among the rest Zoe the Empress was shaven, and thrust into a Monastery, and even Theodore, the Emperor's School-Master, who had so eminently contributed to his Advancement, was sent into Exile.

Zoe the Empress
forc'd into a Monastery.

A. D.
919.
Romanus
crown'd
Emperor.

These Proceedings having, in a short time, remov'd all his Competitors out of the way, he was declar'd Cæsar, and afterwards crown'd Emperor in a most solemn manner by the Hands of the Patriarch. Constantine all the while silently permitting, rather than openly allowing of what was done, whilst Ro-

manus, in Breach of his former Oath, at once invaded the Dignity, and insulted the Person of the Emperor; for not long after having caus'd his Wife Theodora, and Son Christopher to be crown'd, he commanded that he himself should be esteem'd and nam'd Emperor in the first place, and that Constantine should be contented with the second. This he pretended was the only way to prevent Conspiracies, with which he was continually alarm'd. For notwithstanding all his Care and Caution to the contrary, there were still remaining several generous resolute Spirits, who, disdaining the Dominion of an Upstart Favourite, attempted to release the helpless young Emperor out of his arrogant Controul, and restore the Imperial Authority to its proper Channel. Several Projects were set on Foot to that purpose, and the Usurper was frequently in Danger of his Life. However his good Fortune prevail'd, and they were all seasonably discover'd before any could be brought to Execution.

In the midst of these Plots and Contrivances against him, he sought to strengthen and support himself by some powerful Alliances, and marry'd his Daughter Agatha to Leo, the Son of Argyrus, a Man nobly descended, and of a Soul and Body excellently well qualify'd; at the same time he preferr'd others of that Family to the most considerable Employments of the Empire.

Romanus had hardly secur'd himself from the Attempts of his Enemies at home, before he was threaten'd with more imminent Dangers from abroad: For the Bulgarians, taking an Advantage from the Distractions of the State, made an Irruption into the Empire, and meeting with no Resistance in their Course, they threaten'd Constantinople it self, as formerly they had frequently done. Against these Romanus sent his Son-in-Law Leo, and his Brother Pothus Argyrus, together with one John, who, running away in a great Fright at the first Onset, gave occasion

The Bulgarians Invade the Empire.

occasion to a Defeat, which was attended by a miserable Slaughter of the Romans. After this the War was carry'd on for several Years with various Success, tho' the Bulgarians, for the most part, prevail'd, burning and destroying all before 'em. At length Simeon, encourag'd by his Course of good Fortune in the Wars, march'd at the Head of as powerful an Army as he was able to raise, with an Intent to Besiege Constantinople it self. In his Passage he wasted all Thrace and Macedonia, putting sufficient Garrisons into such Places as were defensible, and levelling the rest with the Ground. Having encamp'd his Army at Blackerna, by a Messenger he demanded the Patriarch and some others might be sent out of the City to treat of a Peace, with which Romanus readily comply'd, and Hostages were exchange'd on both sides accordingly. After some time spent in the Conference Simeon requir'd an Interview between himself and Romanus, whom, he said, he esteem'd a prudent and upright Man, to which Romanus willingly condescended. When all things were prepar'd on both sides for the meeting Romanus went first, attended by the Principal of the Nobility, to the Place of Conference, whither Simeon follow'd shortly after; to whom Romanus address'd himself in these Terms. You are reputed a Christian, and a Servant to the same God whom we adore, but your Actions in no measure agree with that Character. If you are in reality, what you outwardly profess, a sincere Christian, put a stop at length to these cruel Devastations. Behold us the Professors of the same Faith with your self; let not therefore the Thirst of Ambition any longer divide those whom our Holy Faith has united. You are a Man subject to the same Infirmities of Nature with us; as such you must live in a daily Expectation of Death, and a firm Assurance of a Resurrection, when you will be call'd to give a just Account of all your Actions, as a Man, a Prince, and a Christian. Let these Thoughts teach you to act with Moderation, and to sheath your Sword, already polluted with the Effusion of too much

Christian

*Romanus
his Speech
to the King of Bulgaria.*

Christian Blood. If what has been done proceeds from a Covetous Mind, and Desire of Riches, the Treasures of the Empire shall be open'd to bribe you to your Duty. Let us no longer, by our unnatural Wars, give the Infidels an Occasion to triumph over us, but rather study to cultivate a Peace between both Nations, as the God of Peace has enjoin'd us.

It is more than probable that Simeon met Romanus with Thoughts quite different from the pretended Intent of that Interview, because, during the Preparations for it, he sent a Body of Soldiers to burn the Church of our Lady at the Fountain, which had been built by the Emperor Justinian, by which he made it appear, that he was no ways inclin'd to Peace. Notwithstanding which he was so nearly touch'd with Romanus his Speech, that he apply'd himself in good earnest to it, and having sign'd the Treaty he return'd home richly laden with Presents from the Emperor.

A Peace concluded between Simeon and the Romans.

Whilst the Bulgarians were thus busy'd in assaulting the Empire by Land, the Saracens, with a strong Fleet, invaded the Sea-Coasts and Islands. At first they met with no Opposition from the Romans, which made 'em act with more Confidence and Security. But John, the Admiral, fell suddenly upon 'em whilst they lay at Lemnos, and attack'd 'em with so much Execution that very few escap'd. This Success against the Saracens, and the Peace lately concluded with the Bulgarians, which was solely attributed to Romanus his prudent Management, serv'd very much to augment his Power and Reputation with the People, so that with the general Acclamations of all he caus'd he Sons, Stephen and Constantine, to be crown'd Emperors : The Emperor Constantine sitting all this while as an idle Spectator, enjoying only the Shadow of that Power which his Rival possess'd in reality. About the same time Thrace, which had suffer'd so much in the late Bulgarian Wars, was visited by most horrible Earthquakes, which overturn'd several Churches, and swallow'd up great Numbers of Men and Houses.

A. D. 928.

Great Earth-quakes in Thrace.

Tho'

Simeon
dies.

His Successor Invades Macedonia.

but concludes a Peace, and marries Romanus
his Daughter.

Tho' Simeon, the King of Bulgaria, had concluded a Peace with the Emperor, yet, being a restless turbulent Prince, he did not long enjoy the Fruits of it; for he shortly after pick'd a Quarrel with some of his Neighbours, and lost his Life in the Dispute, which introduc'd new Troubles in Bulgaria. For the neighbouring Nations, who had been provok'd by his unjust Invasions, prepar'd to fall upon the Bulgarians, at the same time that they labour'd under a grievous Famine at home. Peter, who succeeded his Father in the Kingdom, was directed by the Councils of George Sufurbulus, his Mother's Brother, who, fearing the Romans would be encourag'd by their present Calamities to fall suddenly upon 'em, advis'd the young Prince to Invade them first, which perhaps might make way for an advantageous Treaty. Accordingly Peter made an Inroad into Macedonia, where, when he was inform'd that Romanus the Emperor was marching at the Head of a great Army against him, his Uncle advis'd him to offer some Proposals for a Peace, which was to be strengthen'd by a stricter Alliance, if the Emperor thought fit to give him his Daughter in Marriage. The Overture was very acceptable to Romanus, so that after several Internegotiations, during which George, the King's Uncle, and several others the most Eminent among the Bulgarians, were entertain'd with great respect at Constantinople, Romanus went in Person to receive the young King at the Castle of Blachernæ, where the Nuptials were celebrated with much Solemnity. Here, by Romanus his Artifices, the Bulgarians seem'd highly to resent that Constantine, the true and lawful Emperor, should be suffer'd to take Place of Christopher, who was the Son of so active and vigilant a Prince. Whereupon Romanus, with a seeming reluctancy, was prevail'd upon to let his Son Christopher have the upper Hand, endeavouring thus by degrees to raise all his Family above him, who was once his Lord and Master.

In the mean time, whilst Romanus was thus employ'd with his Sons at home, John Curcuas, his General in Syria, acted with so much Success against the Saracens in those Parts, that having laid Siege to the City of Melitena, and taken it, he subjected the whole Country to the Emperor, who reduc'd it to the Form of a Province, and by that means improv'd the publick Revenues to a great degree. The Joy conceiv'd at Constantinople from the Recovery of so considerable a Branch to the Empire, was interrupted by a Plague which rag'd with the utmost Violence in that populous City. That Calamity was succeeded by another no less terrible, for a Fire broke out near the Forum of the blessed Virgin, which destroy'd a great Number of their fairest Buildings. And on the fourth Day of August, that same Year, Christopher, Romanus his eldest Son, dy'd, to the great Affliction of his Father, who suspected him to be taken off by Treachery.

Whilst Romanus was lamenting the Loss of his Son, Basilus, a Macedonian, pretending himself to be Constantinus Ducas, who was slain in the beginning of this Emperor's Reign, gave a beginning to fresh Disturbances in the Empire. Romanus had met with many Difficulties to contend with during his Usurpation of the Imperial Power, tho' hardly any that gave him more Trouble than this. Basilus was a bold cunning Man, ready to improve whatever Advantages Fortune and his own Industry presented him with. He had taken Care not to declare himself 'till the Distempers of the State had given him a fair Opportunity for it. He knew Romanus was fear'd rather than lov'd, even by those who pretended to be the most faithful to him, and that he was so passionately hated by many others, that they would lay hold on all Occasions to undo him. It is hard to be believ'd how readily the People receiv'd whatever Basilus at his first Appearance affirm'd, so that Romanus, who knew how much it consist'd with his Interest to suppress,

The Russi
defeated by the Ro-
mans.

press him, try'd all ways to get him into his Power, which at length he effected by a Captain in the Army, who, having seiz'd him by a Stratagem, carry'd him to Constantinople, where Romanus commanded one of his Hands to be cut off, and then, thinking him incapable of giving him any further Disturbance, turn'd him loose for fresh Adventures. Basilus, having got a Brass Hand to supply the room of that he had lost, return'd to his former Artifices, and in a short time got such a Multitude of credulous People together, that he seiz'd on a strong Castle, from whence he issu'd out in Parties, and wasted all the Country round about. The Obstinacy of Basilus very much alarm'd Romanus, who thought he never could have persisted with so much Constancy in his Designs, had he not been privately supported by some of the great Men at Court; for which reason, after he had with much Trouble got him once more into his Power, he endeavour'd, by Torture, to discover who of the Nobility had been accessory to his Crime; but when he found he could draw no Confession from him, he order'd him to be burnt alive. After this the Affairs of the Empire seem'd to put on a new Face, for the Russi, Inhabitants of Podolia in Poland, with no less than ten or fifteen thousand Vessels, having infested the Coasts of the Empire, receiv'd so absolute a Defeat through the Vigilance of Theophanes the Admiral, that very few escap'd home with the News of their Misfortunes. About the same time the whole Strength of the Saracen Army was broken by Theophilus, the Governor of Mesopotamia, who in several successful Engagements destroy'd great Multitudes of 'em. During these Publick Felicities Romanus confirm'd an honourable Alliance with Hugh, the King of Italy, whose Daughter was marry'd to Romanus his Grandson, the Son of Constantine the Sixth; in pursuance of this Alliance the Emperor assisted the Italians with a strong Fleet, with which they destroy'd the Navy of the Saracens.

These

These publick Felicities were follow'd shortly after by such a Revolution as prov'd fatal to Romanus and his Family. Being, as he thought, arriv'd to the height of all Human Greatness, and having nothing to apprehend either at home or abroad, he endeavour'd to ingratiate himself with the People, and in some measure expiate his Usurpation by several Acts of Charity and Devotion, which however could not divert the Divine Vengeance that was ready to overtake him. For the Money he dispos'd of, as Zonaras observes, was none of his own, but belong'd to the Sovereign Power which he had unjustly usurp'd, and defrauded another of his Right, enjoying all the Imperial Wealth by Virtue of his Usurpation; what Merit then had he if he conferr'd a small part of it on the needy? Like him who having kill'd his Neighbour's Ox, presumes he has made a sufficient Reparation, if reserving the rest to his own use, he gives the Feet to the Poor.

All this while Constantine, the legal Emperor, liv'd without Authority or Respect, and had been little better than an Imperial Prisoner for almost twenty six Years together, and as some will have it, was reduc'd to so low a Necessity as to be forc'd to work for his own Maintenance. 'Tis highly probable the great Contempt Romanus had of his Person and Capacity, made him attempt nothing against his Life during his Usurpation, but the Event shew'd that the greatest Danger often arises from those, at whose Hands it is least expected. Tho' Constantine had endeavour'd to conceal his Indignation, and had by that means betray'd the Usurper into a fatal Security, yet he secretly attended the first Opportunity of recovering his former Dignity. Romanus, in all outward Appearance, was the Favourite of Fortune, and yet was he very unhappy in his own Family. He had lost his eldest Son Christopher, as has been before observ'd, and had been several times highly provok'd by the undutiful Carriage of Stephen the youn-

G

youngest. Constantine had privately gain'd over to his Interest some Persons that were in great Esteem with Romanus and his Sons ; among these were Basilus Volucer, a Man of a ready Wit, and long Experience in Affairs of State ; and Marianus a Monk, the Son of Leo Argyrus. These Persons, presuming upon the Credit of their Friendship, represented to Stephen, How unworthy it was for a Man of his Age, Interest and Capacity, to suffer the weight of Empire to hang on the decrepid Shoulders of his aged Father, and not to take the Reins into his own Hands. They reminded him how unkind his Father had been to him, and what mighty Things he was in all probability likely to do in behalf of his eldest Brother Constantine, and to his Prejudice. They strengthen'd all with the Promise of a ready Assistance from his Brother-in-Law Constantine the Emperor, who would gladly share the Empire with him, but was offended to see it divided among so many.

A. D.
944.

Romanus
depos'd by his own Sons.

Stephen was a Man fiery and ambitious, but of a very weak Understanding, so that he greedily swallow'd the Bait they had laid for him, and joining in Council with them, resolv'd to remove his Father, which they knew was the first Step towards the Re-establishment of Constantine. Accordingly he order'd his Father by their Assistance, to be seiz'd on the sixteenth of December, and carry'd into the Island Prota, where he was shaven, and thrust into a Monastery. This was the deserved End of Romanus his Usurpation, who own'd his Advancement to his own Disloyalty, and his Destruction to his Son's Disobedience.

Constantine, the Brother of Stephen, having in no measure been consenting to his Fathers Dethronement, entertain'd an implacable Malice to Stephen, who express'd as small a Regard for him. Of this Misunderstanding between the two Brothers, Constantine the Emperor, and his Friends, endeavour'd to make their Advantage. Being thus divided as they were into Factions, they were the more easily to be oppress'd, especially at a Time when the Disgrace of the Father had subjected the whole Family to the Contempt and Indignation of the People, who are naturally fond of a Change. Constantine, pretending to desire a Reconciliation between the two Brothers, invited 'em to an Entertainment, whither they readily came without any Suspicion of what had been contriv'd against them. But in the midst of their Jollity they were both seiz'd by the Emperor's Order, and being banish'd, they were by Virtue of the same Authority, shaven and made Clerks. Stephen out-liv'd his Misfortunes many Years, and dy'd at Lesbos; but his Brother grew so impatient under his Afflictions, that having kill'd one of his Keepers in Samothracia, who prevented him, as he was attempting his Escape, the rest fell in great Rage upon him, and slew him.

were

Thus, by the Destruction of Romanus and his Family, Constantine once more recover'd his former Dignity, and became sole Emperor. His first Care was to reward those who had been instrumental in his Restoration, and prevent any future Designs that might be form'd against him. Accordingly he promoted Basilus Volucer to the Command of the Associates, Marianus Argyrus he made Master of the Horse, and advanc'd the rest of his Friends to such Preferments as he thought their late Services had sufficiently deserv'd. Shortly after, on Easter-Day, he crown'd his Son Romanus, and at the same Time having gelded Romanus, the Son of Stephen, he oblig'd him and the rest of his Relations to enter into Orders. His Son Romanus, whom he had by Helena, the Usurper's Daughter, had formerly been marry'd to Bertha, the Daughter of Hugh, King of France, who being dead, the Emperor thought it highly necessary to marry him again, and, after some Deliberation, bestow'd on him Theophania, a Woman of most admirable Beauty, but descended of very sordid Parentage, therein chusing to comply with his amorous Desires, rather than consult the

Constantine re-
stor'd to his former Dignity.

Reputation of his Family, or the Interest of the State.

A Conspiracy detected.

We meet with little more, during the rest of this Emperor's Reign, worthy our Observation. He is justly condemn'd by most Authors for his great Remissness in the Administration of Affairs, for addicting himself too much to Wine, and other sensual Entertainments; he committed the Management of all to his Wife Helena, and Basilius his Favourite, who made a Market of the most considerable Employments in the Empire, and conferr'd the Places of greatest Trust and Profit on those who were able to give the most for 'em. Notwithstanding this his great Negligence, he is on the other Hand worthily to be commended for his Encouragement shown to Learned Men, and his restoring of Learning to Greece, where it had lain languishing for a long time before. His want of Care in the Administration encourag'd Theophanes the Chamberlain, and several others of great Quality, to endeavour the Restoration of Romanus, or his Son Stephen, and to re-establish one or both of them in the Government; the Thing was so well concerted, and carry'd on with so much Secrecy, that Romanus, old as he was, entertain'd great Hopes of recovering his former Dignity; but a Contention arising between some of the Conspirators, the Plot was discover'd, whereupon Theophanes and his Accomplices were banish'd. Romanus dy'd not long after, but his Son Stephen surviv'd to administer fresh Distrusts to this Emperor and his Successors.

New Wars
with the Saracens.

Nor were these Attempts at home the only Difficulties Constantine had to contend withal, for the Saracens, not forgetting their ancient Animosities, made frequent Inroads into the Empire; so that during all the Delights and Entertainments of the Court the War was continu'd on both sides, and was committed to the Management of Bardas Phocas, and his two Sons, Nicephorus and Leo. Bardas did nothing himself that was answerable to the high Character he bore entrusting all to the Care of his Lieutenants, especially his Sons, who signaliz'd themselves by their many extraordinary Services; nor were they more remarkable for their Valour and Conduct, by which they were render'd terrible to their Enemies, than their Care and Affection to those who serv'd under 'em, which made 'em the Delight of the Soldiers. Leo had, in a pitch'd Battel, overthrown the Saracens, and taken Apolusemus, nearly related to the Prince of that Nation, and a Man of great Authority among them. The Prisoner was sent to Constantinople by Order from the Emperor, who led him about in Triumph, and in an insulting manner trod upon his Neck. This indignity highly provok'd the Caliph, who having taken Constantine, Bardas his younger Son, endeavour'd by all means to make him abjure his Religion, and when he found nothing would force him to turn Apostate, he treated him after a most barbarous manner, and at length poison'd him; at which Phocas was so enrag'd that he murder'd all the Relations of the Caliph, who had the Misfortune to fall into his Hands, whereupon the Saracens invaded the Empire with a greater Force than they had done any Time before. The Caliph carry'd with him Nicetas, a Patrician, and several other Persons of Quality that were his Prisoners, with an intent to kill 'em in sight of the Roman Army. Nicetas was a Man of an insinuating Temper, by which means he wonderfully wrought himself into the good Opinion of the Caliph, who, through a strange Credulity, made him acquainted with all his Designs, which he immediately communicated to Phocas, who lay in Ambush for him in a narrow Pass, and cut off the greatest part of his Army; the Caliph himself escap'd with a very small Retinue, but before his Flight kill'd all the Prisoners he had in his Custody, except Nicetas, who having corrupted his Keepers, got away at the beginning of the Engagement.
ny

These frequent Inroads, and the continual Losses his Subjects sustain'd, especially from those who had once more settled in Crete, from whence they had formerly been driven by Basilus, very much afflicted the Emperor, who therefore mann'd out a very considerable Fleet, on Board of which a strong Army embark'd, with Order to try all means possible to expel 'em.

Had their Design been as manfully executed, as it was prudently laid, the Expedition had ended much to the Reputation and Safety of the Empire. But the Emperor made choice of Constantinus Gongylas, one of the Bedchamber, for his General; who having had the greatest part of his Education in the Court, was an utter Stranger to the Arts of War, and entirely incapable of so considerable an Employment. Having landed his Army without any Opposition from the Saracens, who were altogether unprovided for so sudden a Descent, he neither took Care to fortifie himself by any Works, nor sent out his Spies to gain Intelligence of the Enemy's Motions, who observing as well the Negligence as Ignorance of the General, fell suddenly on the Romans, and totally defeated 'em. After a very great Slaughter, they took their Camp with all their Ammunition and Baggage, and had not some of the General's Guards defended him with an invincible Courage, he had undoubtedly fallen into their Hands. These Misfortunes, and the great Advantages the Saracens obtain'd on every side, were imputed by Romanus, the Emperor's Son, to the Age and Insufficiency of his Father; for which reason his Wife Theophania, who eagerly desir'd to be Absolute, easily persuaded him to conspire against him, and prevail'd with Nicetas, an Officer, who attended at the Table, to attempt his Life by Poison, which he administred to him instead of a purging Potion the Physicians had prescrib'd him. The Emperor, as he was about to drink it, either casually, or by design, stumbled, and spilt the greatest part of it, so that it had not the desir'd Effect, tho' he never after had the full enjoyment of his Health.

Constantine in great danger by his Son's Practices.

A. D. 960.

The September following, being uneasie in his Mind, and distemper'd in his Body, he took an unreasonable

seasonable Journey to the Mountain Olympus, to entreat, as it was given out, the Prayers of the Monks for Success in an Expedition he was then meditating against the Saracens in Syria, tho' his true Design was to consult with Theodorus, Bishop of Cyzicus, residing there, how to expel Polyeuctus, Patriarch of Constantinople; who, having too openly resented the Injuries done to Romanus and his Family, had incurr'd the Emperor's Displeasure. Whilst he was there he fell violently sick, either thro' the ill Habit of his Body, or for that his Son had proceeded further in his Practices upon him; so that perceiving the ill Condition he was in, he order'd himself to be carry'd back in a Litter to Constantinople, where he dy'd on the Ninth of November, before he could execute what he had design'd against Polyeuctus, his inveterate Hatred to whom he carry'd with him to his Grave. Curopolates tells us, that some time before his Death several Stones fell with an unusual Violence from above into his Apartment. He, thinking they were thrown down from the upper Rooms, by some who had a Design upon his Life, order'd a Watch every Night, for the Thing was often repeated to the great Amazement of all that were about him, to try if they could discover the Offenders; but to no purpose, saith this Author, for they were sent down by a Divine Power, and not directed against him by any Human Contrivance.

We observ'd before how much this Prince was addicted to Wine, and how careless in what related to the Government of the State. He is likewise condemn'd for his great Severity even towards the smallest Offenders, and the unhappy Choice of his Magistrates, which redounded much to his Dishonour, and the Detriment of the Publick. On the other Hand, being himself well skill'd in Arithmetick, Astronomy, Geometry, and all the Parts of Philosophy, as well Natural as Moral, he was a great Benefactor to learned Men, whom he sent for from all

*His Advice
to his Son.*

Parts, and gave 'em unusual Encouragements. He was constant and sincere in his Devotions, seldom going to the Temple without adorning the Altar with Presents worthy an Emperor, and a true Lover of Jesus Christ. He advis'd his Son, before he dy'd, never to marry with any of the barbarous Nations, which he founded upon a Precept left by Constantine the Great, and the Canons of the Church. In this Emperor's Reign Luitprandus the Historian flourish'd, who so deservedly taxes the Bishops of those Times with Pride and Ambition. Constantine dy'd in the fifty fifth Year of his Age, and fiftieth Year of his Reign, the fifth of John the Pope of Rome, and twenty fifth of Otho the Great Emperor of Germany, who is deservedly renown'd for his great Actions.

Romanus.

Constantine being dead, Romanus succeeded him without any Opposition in the Empire. He was surnam'd the Boy, to distinguish him from the other Romanus his Grandfather. They who had the Care of this Prince his Education in his Youth, indulg'd him in all the Licentiousness of a luxurious Court, which in the End prov'd very pernicious to the State; for tho' by Nature he seem'd capable of governing with Prudence and Moderation, yet they who were near his Person at his Advancement to the Imperial Dignity, took care so to entangle him in his Pleasures, to which Custom had too much inclin'd him, that the Management of Affairs might be left solely to them. These Practices quickly introduc'd a new Disposition in the Court, for Romanus not only recall'd such as had been banish'd by Constantine for their many Villanies, but preferr'd 'em to Posts of Profit and Honour. This was done at the Instigation of Joseph his Chamberlain, who being a Person of no real Merit, and for that reason dislik'd and despis'd by those that were, he endeavour'd to strengthen his Interest by the Friendship of such as were as unworthy as himself. Whilst this Man was thus carrying on his Intrigues, the Emperor wallow'd in all manner of Debauchery.

Debaucheries, associating himself with none of either Sex, but such as were able to gratifie him in his Filthiness. These Courses not only shorten'd his own Days, but had like to have prov'd destructive in the Issue to his whole Family. He had two Sons, the eldest of which, nam'd Basilus, he order'd to be crown'd by the Patriarch on Easter-Day, and imagining he had by that Act confirm'd to his Posterity what he enjoy'd in Person, he resign'd himself up without any further Care to his Debaucheries, committing the sole Management of Affairs at home to Joseph, and the Care of his Forces abroad to the Conduct of Nicephorus Phocas, whom his Father in his Life-time had declar'd his General.

Nicephorus was a Person of extraordinary Merit, signaliz'd by his many Services to the State, and was now sent to command in an Expedition against the Saracens in Crete. Those of the Enemy that endeavour'd to oppose his Landing were easily defeated, after which he encamp'd himself, and secur'd his Ships in the Harbour. The Saracens came down with all the Forces of the Island against him, notwithstanding which in seven Months time he took almost all their strong Towns and Forts, and had undoubtedly recover'd the whole Island, had not Joseph, who grew jealous of his Success, persuaded the Emperor to recal him, by suggesting to him that there was a Tradition constantly receiv'd, That he who conquer'd Crete, would in Time be Master of the Roman Empire.

Nicephorus his Exploits against the Saracens.

Whilst Nicephorus was thus prevailing against the Saracens in Crete, his Brother Leo fought against 'em with equal Success in the East, where they propos'd to make a Descent, on purpose to divert the Romans from their Designs against Crete. Leo engag'd 'em at the Head of a small but resolute Army, and gave 'em such an Overthrow, that great Multitudes of them were kill'd upon the Place, and the rest sent Prisoners in great Drove to Constantinople, where all the Houses were fill'd with Slaves. After this Leo triumph'd, as he deserv'd, in the Imperial Imperial City, where he receiv'd Rewards proportionable to his Service done in the Expedition ; but his Brother Nicephorus, tho' he had deserv'd as much as any Man, yet was he not permitted to come to Court, but was order'd to march with all his Forces into the East, where the Saracen General having recruited his Army after his late Defeat, was preparing for fresh Hostilities. Nicephorus march'd with so much Expedition against him, that he arriv'd in Syria, and offer'd him Battel before he had time to do any Mischief to the Subjects of the Empire. The Fight was manag'd with a great deal of Obstinacy on both Sides, but at length the Fortune of the Romans prevail'd, and the Saracens, after a great Slaughter, were put to a shameful Flight. The City of Berrhæa, as a Consequence of the Victory, fell into the Conqueror's Hands, and Nicephorus found in it much Wealth, and many Prisoners, besides a multitude of Christian Captives, who by this means were releas'd.

Nicephorus his Valour and Conduct had render'd him exceeding grateful to all, especially to Theophania the Empress, who being disgusted at the leud Behaviour of Romanus, had entertain'd an extraordinary Esteem for Nicephorus. Of this Josepb was not ignorant, and therefore justly apprehending the Consequence of such a Disposition in the Empress, he endeavour'd, by all Arts imaginable, to prevent the General's Return to Constantinople. This he might, in all probability, very easily have effected, had not the Death of Romanus prevented him, who dy'd on the fifteenth Day of March, in the twenty fifth Year of his Age, and the third of his Reign. Some say he was poison'd, and that by the Procurement of the Empress her self; others impute his Death to his great Intemperance, and his immoderate Use of Wine and Women.

A. D.
963.
Romanus
dies.

The Death of Romanus introduc'd a new Face of Affairs in the Court and Empire. The late Emperor had left behind him two Sons, Basilus and Constantine, who

who being very young, the Empress was declar'd Regent, who immediately commanded Nicephorus to return to Constantinople, where he triumph'd in the Circus, and gratify'd the People with the sight of the rich Spoils he had taken in Crete, and at Berrhæa: Joseph, who very much suspected his ambitious Designs, in vain opposing it. Nicephorus, during his Stay at Con- Nicepho-rus triumphs at Constantinople.
stantinople, endeavour'd by a religious Artifice, to remove the Suspicions of the Prime Minister. In a private Conference he had obtain'd from him at his own House, he told him very gravely, how desirous he had been for a long Time to retire from the World, and the Vanities that abounded in it, but had been all the while prevented by the Kindness of his several Masters, who forc'd Employments of the greatest Trust upon him. At the same Time, as an Instance of his great Devotion, he show'd him a Hair Shirt, which he pretended he wore constantly next his Skin. Joseph, surpriz'd at his Behaviour, and the sight of his Shirt, fell at his Feet, and with Tears in his Eyes begg'd his Pardon, declaring, that for the future he would believe nothing that should be urg'd against him.

After this Nicephorus, by Joseph's Advice, was sent with fresh Power into the East, where the Motions of the Saracens seem'd to require his Presence. Nicephorus his Arms were crown'd with his usual Success, which ingratiated him every Day more and more with the Soldiers and the People; but at the same Time it reviv'd the Jealousies of Joseph, who began to repent that he had let him escape out of his Hands, and seriously consider'd which was the readiest way to destroy him. Joseph was so imprudent as to commit the Execution of his Designs to two of the Principal Commanders in the East, promising to make one of 'em General in Chief of the Imperial Forces in the East, and the other of those in the West, provided they would, by some means or other, remove Nicephorus out of the way. These Persons were Men of great

Nicephorus.

great Interest and Authority in the Army, and ow'd their Advancement, in a great measure, to Nicephorus his Friendship, to whom they deliver'd the Letters they had receiv'd from Joseph, and advis'd him to provide for his own Safety, by taking upon himself the Imperial Dignity. This he oppos'd at first with a seeming Bravery, but having receiv'd great Encouragement from the Empress, with whom he entertain'd a constant Correspondence, he suffer'd the Towns of the East to salute him Emperor, and prepar'd with great Diligence to make good his Title.

Nicephorus was not more belov'd and esteem'd by the People for his Valour and Affability, than Joseph was contemn'd by 'em for his Pride and Arrogance, so that the Citizens of Constantinople receiv'd the News of these Proceedings in the East with the greatest Demonstrations of Joy imaginable. Joseph's House, with all those of his Party, were levell'd with the Ground by the tumultuous Rabble, and the Streets rebounded with joyful Acclamations to Nicephorus Callinicus, or the Brave Emperor, Bardas, the Father of Nicephorus, upon the first Report of his Son's Promotion, had taken Sanctuary in the great Church; but when he observ'd that the People, with a general Concurrence, declar'd in his Favour, he came out, and in the Emperor's Pinnace, which was follow'd by the rest of the Fleet, he sail'd down to Chrysopolis, whither the Army had by this time conducted their new Prince. From Chrysopolis he was brought up to the Hebdomus, where he was met by the People, who accompany'd him with much Solemnity into the City, where he was crown'd on the sixteenth of August, by the Hands of Polyeuctus the Patriarch.

Nicephorus crown'd Emperor at Constantinople.

A. D.

963.

Nicephorus, being thus acknowleg'd and crown'd Emperor, banish'd Joseph into Paphlagonia, where he ended his Life two Years after in a Monastery. Bardas, the Emperor's Father, was declar'd Cæsar, and Nicephorus, thinking he might now with great Safety throw off the Mask, marry'd the Empress Theopbania;

in which he was at first oppos'd by the Patriarch, for that he had been marry'd before, and because it was reported that he once stood God-father to one of Theophania's Children, which she had by her former Husband, and that Spiritual Alliance in those Days was thought a just Matrimonial Impediment. Polyeuctus proceeded so far as to Excommunicate the Emperor, but when in a Synod summon'd at Constantinople the Matter was examin'd, the Patriarch concurr'd with the rest of the Bishops, and restor'd him to the Church, tho' the Emperor never forgave him the Affront as long as he liv'd. The Saracens that inhabited Sicily had, even since the Reign of Basilus Macedo, exacted a Tribute from the Western Provinces of the Empire, which they had been forc'd to pay either through the Ignorance or Knavery of those who had been sent to Command in those Parts. The Payment of this Tribute Nicephorus thought highly detrimental to the Honour and Reputation of the Empire, and for that Reason he undertook a War against them.

Accordingly having rais'd a very powerful Army he committed it to the Conduct of Manuel, his Uncle Leo's base Son. Manuel was a young hot-headed Patrician, so fond of his own Notions, that he was deaf to the wholesome Advice of those to whose Councils he ought to have inclin'd, and by that means lost both himself and his Army; for the Saracens, having drawn him into the most craggy and unpassable Parts of Sicily, with great ease cut him off. The Sense of this Disgrace was, in a great measure, alleviated by John Zimisces his Success in Cilicia, where having defeated a great Number of the Saracens, about five thousand of 'em quitted their Horses, and gain'd an advantageous Hill, where they resolv'd to defend themselves to the last, depending much upon the Situation of the Place, which they judg'd inaccessible. Zimisces, observing their Resolution, judg'd it proper to follow 'em their own way, so that quit-

The Romans defeated by the Saracens in Sicily.

ting

ting his Horse he march'd himself at the Head of his Foot, and with an irresistible Courage fell upon them. The Saracens receiv'd him with an obstinate Bravery, and fought with so much Resolution, that not one of 'em turn'd his Back, but they were all slain upon the Spot, and such Streams of Blood issu'd from their Bodies, and roll'd down into the Plain, that the Hill, where the Action was perform'd, was from that time forward call'd the Bloody Hill.

A. D.
964.
Nicepho-
rus his Expedition.

The Year following, being the second of his Reign, Nicephorus sent an Army against the Saracens in Cyprus, which he recover'd from 'em, and reannext it to the Dominions of the Empire. In the Month of July, the same Year, taking his Wife and Children with him, he march'd himself into Cilicia at the Head of a gallant Army, consisting partly of his own Subjects, and partly of his Associates. There he took three of their strongest Cities from the Saracens, besides several Castles; and having left a strong Guard to secure his Conquests, he winter'd with the rest of his Army in Cappadocia. Tarsus and Mopsuestia were Places too considerable to be attempted at that time of the Year, when the Season was so far advanc'd; and therefore returning in the Spring he divided his Forces into two Parts, and gave his Brother Leo Orders to fall upon Tarsus with one, whilst he led the other in Person against Mopsuestia. The Inhabitants of Mopsuestia defended themselves for a considerable time, 'till being weaken'd, as well by Famine as the Sword, the City was taken, and the most forward among the Defendants put to Death. The Fate of Mopsuestia very much dishearten'd the Besieg'd in Tarsus, so that they surrender'd the City three Days before a Fleet from Egypt arriv'd to their Assistance. The Soldiers on Board the Fleet attempted to Land, but meeting with a Repulse they prepar'd to return home, when a Storm overtook 'em, which destroy'd a great Number of their Ships, and most of the rest fell into the Hands of the Romans.

The Sara-
cen Fleet
destroy'd.

After

After this he Invaded Syria, where having conquering all the Towns and Forts that had the Courage to resist him, and made 'em Tributary to the Empire, he march'd forward and sat down before Antioch. The Town was well supply'd with a numerous Garrison, and great plenty of Provision, whereas the Emperor's Army began to stand in need of many Necessaries, so that Winter drawing on he thought it best to raise his Siege, and return to Constantinople. Some affirm he might easily have taken the City, but declin'd it by reason of a Prophecy, which declar'd that whatever Emperor took that City he would not be long liv'd after it. 'Tis certain that when Burtzas, the Lieutenant-General, whom the Emperor had left behind to secure his Conquests in those Parts, and who lay with a Body of his Forces near that Place, watching an Opportunity, surpriz'd the City in the Emperor's Absence, and thereby did the Empire a considerable piece of Service; Nicephorus, instead of rewarding him as he deserv'd, turn'd him out of his Employment, and forbad him the Court, which provok'd Burtzas to join himself with Zimisces, who in the end depriv'd Nicephorus both of Empire and Life. Had Nicephorus behav'd himself with as much Prudence and Moderation at home, as he fought with Valour and Success abroad, his Reign might have been long and glorious; but he is a strong Instance to us of the Unhappiness of that Prince that does not endeavour to reign in the Hearts of his People. The Dominions of the Empire were very much enlarg'd during his Reign, but his Subjects receiv'd no other Benefit from his Conquests than to be oppress'd with a heavier Hand. He indulg'd the Soldiers in all manner of Licentiousness, and at the same time us'd the Citizens with the utmost Severity. The Senators, the Bishops, the Patriarch himself met with the same Treatment from him, being no better dispos'd to them than to the meanest of the People. He stopp'd such Pensions as the Senators us'd to re-

*Antioch
recover'd
from the Saracens.*

*Nicepho-rus his Management
at home.*

ceive

ceive out of the Treasury, and forbad the Payment of such Exhibitions as had been assign'd by his Predecessors towards the Maintenance of Churches, Monasteries, and to other Pious Uses ; and made a Law, whereby it was prohibited to give any more Lands to the Church. At the same time he challeng'd to himself the Right of Presentation to vacant Bishopricks ; and having, with a thrifty Hand, defray'd the Expence of a Funeral, he sent his Officers to seize on the rest of the Revenue belonging to the deceas'd. Under a Pretence of the extraordinary Sums that were requir'd to carry on his Wars, he laid new Impositions upon his Subjects ; so that all Parts of his Dominions swarm'd with Collectors and Informers, who often seiz'd on all, and ruin'd whole Families at once : And that nothing might be wanting to incense the Multitude against him, he debas'd the Coin, causing some of less Value to be made than what at that time was current, and exacted all Payments to himself to be made in the greater Sort, and all Issues out of the Treasury to be made in the less, and enhanc'd the Price of his own Coins above those of his Predecessors, tho' they were the same as to their Intrinsick Value ; all which Practices prov'd extreamly prejudicial to Trade, and consequently rais'd the Price of all Commodities. Whilst the People were thus inrag'd against him, he began, at a great Expence, to fortifie the Imperial Palace, pulling down several beautiful Buildings, belonging to private Persons that stood adjoining to it, to make room for a Cittadel erected for its Security, in which he built Granaries and Store-houses supply'd with all manner of Provisions. Shortly after a grievous Famine arose, occasion'd by the scorching Winds that had blasted the Corn. His Behaviour to the People confirm'd the implacable Hatred they had conceiv'd against him ; for having his own Magazines, during that Scarcity, sufficiently stor'd, he sold Wheat to the People at more than a double Price ; so that an

an old Man came to the Emperor, whilst he was mustering his Soldiers, and desir'd to be enroll'd among 'em; and when Nicephorus demanded, Why he, who was so aged, and consequently infirm, should desire to undergo the Fatigues of War? The Man reply'd, He found himself stronger now than he had been in his Youth, for he was able to carry as much Corn now upon his Back, as he then us'd to load upon two Asses.

The general Temper of the People, and their vow'd Aversion towards him, encourag'd Zimisces and several others to conspire against him. Zimisces had render'd him several important Services, and so had Burtzas the Patrician, notwithstanding which they had both been dismiss'd with Disgrace; and Theophania the Empress, tho' she had formerly labour'd so earnestly for his Advancement, was now engag'd with those that fought his Destruction. Several Reasons are assign'd for this Change in her, some alledging that she apprehended his Design was to Geld her Sons Basilus and Constantine, and declare his Brother Leo his Successor; others affirm, that he was too Chaste a Bed-fellow for a Woman of her Constitution, being wont to sleep on the Ground, to which he had been accusom'd from his Youth. The Description of his Person, which we meet with in Baronius and others, seems to confirm this Suggestion, and makes us wonder not so much how she came to loath him now, as for what Reason she could love him at first; unless it be that some Women are often touch'd with the Reputation of Valour and Bravery, but are of too delicate a Taste to be long affected with it. Some say that ten Days before his Death a Writing was left in his Chamber, in which he was advis'd to provide for his own Safety, and take Care of Zimisces; and that he, imagining the Paper contain'd some Petition, let it lye on his Table without opening it. Others add, that he did open and read it, but that his Fate pressing hard upon him he took no Warning from it, tho' he is said to have sent Orders to his Brother Leo,

Ad Ann.
968.

the Night before he was kill'd, to come strongly arm'd to his Defence ; and that Leo being engag'd at Chess, a Game he greatly delighted in, when the Letter was brought, he deferr'd opening it 'till it was too late. Zimisces had been confin'd to his own House in the Country, by express Order from the Emperor, yet the Empress procur'd his Enlargement, and not only got him to be convey'd secretly to Constantinople, tho' Nicephorus had positively forbidden it, but had him and his Accomplices drawn up by Night in a Basket into the Palace, where they found the unhappy Emperor asleep in a Bear-skin upon the Ground, as his Custom was, and in no manner prepar'd for such an Encounter. Zimisces first kick'd him with his Foot to awaken him, and as he was endeavouring to rise, Leo Abalantius gave him a Mortal Wound on his Head, whilst he said no more than Lord have Mercy upon me, the Mother of God help me ! The Guards by this time had receiv'd the Alarm, and were preparing with all Diligence to relieve him, which, when the Conspirators observ'd, they cut off his Head, and show'd it the Soldiers out at the Window ; who observing the Business was already over, and therefore not to be prevented, retir'd something pleas'd, expecting what farther Designs the Conspirators had in view.

Nicepho-
rus slain.

This was the unhappy End of Nicephorus the Emperor, who being from his Youth inur'd to the Wars, examin'd the Measure of Good and Evil by that Standard. In the beginning of his Reign he was successful in most, or all his Attempts against the Infidels ; but Baronius observes, that when once he invaded with a Sacrilegious Hand what belong'd to the Church, he not only lost the Esteem and Affection of all good Men, but God himself, from a Protector, became a severe Avenger, and suffer'd him to fall by the Hands of Traitors. Undoubtedly he knew better how to Command in War than Rule in Peace, for he recover'd Antioch, Cilicia, and the greatest part of

His Cha-
racter.

of Asia Minor from the Dominion of the Saracens; but his Ignorance in Affairs of State, and abominable Covetousness, defac'd the Honour he had acquir'd in Arms, and procur'd his Ruin. He was murder'd in the seventh Year of his Reign, the thirty fourth of Otto the Great, and the fifth of John the Thirteenth Pope of Rome, and the fifty eighth of his Age, A. D. 969.

Nicephorus being murder'd, Johannes Zimisces seiz'd A. D. on the Empire, assuming Basilius and Constantine for 969. his Collegues. Before he would permit himself to be Zimisces. Crown'd he remov'd such as he thought had been Favourers to Nicephorus from all Employments in the State and the Army; and having confin'd Leo, Nicephorus his Brother, to the Isle of Lesbos, he recall'd all those his Predecessor had banish'd, especially such of the Ecclesiasticks as had been driven away for opposing him in Matters relating to the Church. Having, as he thought, by these means clear'd his Way for his Coronation, he went to receive the Crown from the Hands of the Patriarch in the Great Church; but Polyeuctus, with an unexpected Severity oppos'd his Entrance into that Place, which was not to be prophan'd with the Presence of one who had embru'd his Hands in the Blood of his Sovereign, for which Satisfaction was to be made before he could be admitted. Whether this Matter had been concerted privately before-hand between Zimisces and the Patriarch, on purpose to obtain a plausible Pretence for removing the Empress Theophania, or that Zimisces was unwilling, at that Conjunction, to contend with the Church, he receiv'd the Reprehension with a great Submissiveness, promising a Performance of any Thing that in Reason might be enjoin'd him, and alledg'd, at the same Time, in his own Defence, that he was not personally guilty of the late Emperor's Death, but that Abalantius murder'd him by Command of the Empress. Hereupon the Patriarch requir'd that she

Zimisces
crown'd
Emperor.

and the Murderers might be banish'd, and the Edict made by Nicephorus, relating to the Church, might be cancell'd, to all which Zimisces readily comply'd. Theophania was shut up close in a Monastery in the Province of Armenia, being justly excluded from the World, and the sensual Enjoyments of it, to which she had been too much addicted. Zimisces, at the same Time, promis'd to assign all his own private Estate to the use of the Poor, whereupon Polyeuctus admitted him into the Church, where he was Crown'd by him on Christmas-Day.

The Sara-
cens defeated before Antioch.

It is often observable, that Revolutions at home give Birth to new Commotions abroad, which Zimisces found true at the Beginning of his Reign; for the Cities his Predecessor had taken from the Saracens in the East were grown ripe for a Revolt; to favour which, and recover their Reputation, all the Nations of that Religion engag'd themselves in a strict League and Alliance, and having collected prodigious Forces together, the Command of the whole Army was, by general Consent, given to the Carthaginians as the most capable, and best experienc'd in War both by Sea and Land. This Command the Carthaginians transferr'd upon Zochares, whom they declar'd Generalissimo. Having muster'd their Forces they sat down before Antioch, which they besieg'd very closely, hoping to be Masters of it before they Besieg'd could receive any Relief from the Emperor; but the Garrison, being assisted by the Inhabitants, perform'd their Duty so well, that Nicholas an Eunuch, who was declar'd General by the Emperor, fell upon 'em with all the Forces he could raise in Mesopotamia, and the neighbouring Provinces gave 'em Battel, forc'd 'em to raise the Siege, and return in a disorderly manner home, and by that means confirm'd the Capital Cities of those Parts in their Obedience.

Whilst the Emperor's Arms prosper'd with so much Success in the East, the Territories of the Empire were threaten'd by the Incursions of the Russi, who had over-run all Bulgaria, into which they had formerly been invited by Nicephorus Phocas, upon a Quarrel between him and Peter, Prince of Bulgaria. Nicephorus had engag'd 'em to plunder, but not possess the Country; but they finding it much more pleasant and fertile than their own, resolv'd, contrary to their Articles with Nicephorus, to settle themselves in it. Calocyrrus, a Roman Fugitive, was then in their Camp, and oblig'd himself to resign Bulgaria up to 'em, provided he might be made Emperor by their Assistance. The Russi, who had been inform'd of the late Revolutions at Constantinople, thought it no very difficult matter to effect what Calocyrrus had with so much Confidence propos'd, so that challenging Bulgaria for their own, as having acquir'd it by Virtue of their Swords, and being in Possession of it, they insolently rejected the Ambassadors Zimisces had sent with Offers to confirm whatever had been concluded betwixt them and Nicephorus. To make good their Pretensions they united to 'em as many of the conquer'd Bulgarians as they thought they might safely trust, and being join'd by a Body of the Hungarians, they muster'd an Army of three hundred and eight thousand Men, with which having pass'd the Hæmus, they wasted all Thrace, and sat down before Adrianople.
had

Zimisces, provok'd at their Insolence to his Ambassadors, had order'd all the Forces could be drawn together to march Westward under the Conduct of Bardas Sclerus, or the Hardy, his Wife's Brother, resolving, when the Spring came on, to be in Person at the Head of his Army. Bardas perceiving he should have to do with Numbers so far superior to his, for he was not able to Muster above twelve or thirteen thousand Men, thought it best to contend with 'em by Stratagems, and therefore suffer'd 'em to ravage Thrace, whilst he shut himself up in Adrianople before they could approach it. The Barbarians endeavour'd by all Methods imaginable, to provoke him to Fight, and he with equal Care, and much seeming Diffidence, declin'd it. This Behaviour in the Roman General created a Contempt and Negligence in the Enemy, who, being secure of their Prey, observ'd no Discipline, but grew negligent in their Watches, and regardless of Orders.

A great Victory obtain'd by
the Ro-
mans.

The Event answer'd Bardas Sclerus his Expectations; for John, a Patrician, having by the General's Order drawn a great Body of the presumptuous Enemy into an Ambuscade, they pursu'd him with an undisciplin'd Fury as he fled designedly from 'em, till they fell unadvisedly upon a stronger Party planted there for that purpose, and commanded by Bardas himself, who cut every Man of the Barbarians in pieces. After this he fell with a Courage quicken'd with his late Success upon the rest, who fought for some time like Men animated with Despair, but in the End receiv'd an absolute Defeat, which was chiefly to be ascrib'd to the Valour of Bardas the General, and his Brother Constantine. Had not Night befriended 'em, none of the Enemy had escap'd; great Multitudes were taken Prisoners, and few among 'em were observ'd to be unwounded, tho' some Writers affirm the Romans lost not above five and twenty Men in both Engagements.

Bardas
Phocas
Usurps,

The Emperor was so far from being puff'd up with this extraordinary Success against the Enemies of the Empire, that it rather made him more humble and merciful, as he made it appear shortly after this Victory. For Bardas Phocas, the late Emperor's Nephew, who had been banish'd into Amasia, having receiv'd some Encouragement from his Friends and Acquaintance at Constantinople, withdrew on a sudden out of Amasia, and seiz'd on Cæsarea in Cappadocia; where being join'd by several considerable Men in the Empire, who had not concurr'd in the late Revolution, and who had brought a strong Body of Forces along with them, he assum'd the Imperial Ornaments, and declar'd himself Emperor. At the same same Time Leo, the Father of Phocas, who had been confin'd to the Isle of Lesbos, having seduc'd several by large Gifts, and larger Promises, in which the Bishop of Abydos did him signal Service, prepar'd to steal from thence with his Son Nicephorus, and appear at the Head of his Party in Thrace. But some of the Emperor's Officers having apprehended the Bishop, he was examin'd, and discover'd the whole Design, whereupon Leo and Nicephorus were condemn'd to Death, which Sentence the merciful Emperor mitigated to the losing of their Eyes; and, as if that Punishment was too severe and cruel for his Capital Enemies, some add further, that the Executioners, by his Order, made show only of blinding 'em, and gave out that they spar'd their Sight not in Obedience to any Commands they had receiv'd from the Emperor, but out of meer Pity to those unfortunate Princes. And yet those very Men shortly after rais'd another Rebellion, whilst the Emperor was busied in his Wars with the Russians, for which that very Punishment was deservedly inflicted upon 'em. In the mean Time Bardas the General was, by an Order from the Emperor, who had charg'd him to shed no more Blood than was necessary, marching against Phocas, and was got as far as Dorylaus, the Capital of Phrygia, where he endeavour'd first by fair Offers, and an Assurance of Mercy from Zimisces, to reduce Phocas and his Accomplices; but when he found they persisted obstinately in their Rebellion, he left Dorylaus, and proceeded on to Cæsarea. Here those who had chiefly promoted Phocas in his Usurpation, and had appear'd the most forward to support him, considering what fair Promises they had receiv'd from Bardas, and how desperate their Condition would be should they miscarry, privately agreed among themselves, and withdrew with all their Forces from Phocas, who by that means had no other Attendance left him than of his own Servants, so that he was forc'd to fly, and shut himself up in a strong Castle call'd Cyropalum,

and is sup-
press'd.

pæum, which at first he resolv'd to defend to the last Extremity ; but when Bardas came up, and by repeated Messages urg'd him to a Surrender, promising him all imaginable Kindness on his part, and undertaking to obtain his Pardon from the Emperor, he generously threw himself into his Protection, and was confin'd to the Island Chios; where he enter'd into Orders ; for the Emperor being willing to make good what Bardas had promis'd, thought fit to proceed no farther against him, tho' we shall find him recall'd in the following Reign to command an Army against this Bardas, who had now suppress'd him.

These eminent Services to the Empire, contributed much to the Reputation of Sclerus, who was sent for to Constantinople, where Zimisces was marry'd shortly after in great Solemnity to Theodora, the Sister of the late Emperor Romanus, according to some, tho' others affirm she was his Daughter by Theophania the Empress, and consequently the Sister of Basilus and Constantine, the Collegues of this present Emperor.

A. D.
971.
The Russian War breaks out
again.

The late Defeat of the Russians had not so much weaken'd and discourag'd 'em, but they prepar'd to give the Emperor new Troubles ; whereupon Zimisces resolv'd to march in Person against 'em, and, if possible, totally to subdue 'em. Accordingly he endeavour'd by his obliging Carriage, and generous Presents, to win the Hearts of his Army, which he supply'd with the most prudent and valiant Officers, who had Orders to Exercise their Soldiers every Day, and establish a good Discipline among them. At the same Time he took Care to lay in great Stores of Ammunition and Provision ; and when he had, with great Application, sufficiently provided for his Land Forces, he rigg'd out a strong Fleet, which prov'd very serviceable to him in the Course of his Expedition. Before he set forward he committed the Administration of Affairs at home to the Hands of those in whom he thought he had the greatest reason to confide ; and having finish'd his Devotions,

ons, in which he appear'd most exemplary, he began his March in the beginning of the Spring at the Head of an Army, remarkable as well for the Courage and Chearfulness of the Soldiers, as the Care and Experience of their Commanders. At a Place call'd Rædestus he was met by two Persons, who pretending themselves to be Ambassadors, made loud Complaints of the great Injuries offer'd the Nation of the Scythians. Zimisces, who knew they were sent as Spies from the Enemy, made 'em take a view of all his Forces, and then order'd 'em to return with a Report of what they had observ'd to their Masters, after which, without any other Answer, he dismiss'd 'em. When this was done he drew out five thousand Foot and four thousand Horse, with which he himself march'd with great Expedition over the Mountain Hæmus, and laid Siege to Prestblaba, the Principal City of Bulgaria, ordering the rest of his Forces to follow after, under the Conduct of Basilus the President. Calocyrus, of whom mention has already been made, was then in the City, where the Inhabitants were seiz'd with the greatest Consternation, so that the Fugitive secretly withdrew into the Russian Camp, which he fill'd with almost an equal Astonishment. Hereupon the General of the Russians having, in the best manner he could, encourag'd his desponding Soldiers, encamp'd nearer the City, hoping by his Presence to animate the Defendants. But as a Party of his Troops, consisting of eight thousand Men, were detatch'd from the rest of the Army, either to be exercis'd near the City Walls, or show themselves to their Friends within, who were prepar'd to receive them; Zimisces fell with great Resolution upon 'em, and having intercepted their Retreat to their Camp, he either kill'd or took most of 'em; among the latter was Sphagellus, a Man in Authority next to their General.

Zimisces
his Expedi- tion.

His Success.

Zimisces his Soldiers were extremely animated by this Action, which seem'd to give 'em an Earnest of their

their future Success, so that they fell immediately with great Bravery upon the City, and were rather drawn off by the Approach of the Night, than repuls'd by the Courage of the Besieg'd. The next Morning Basilius appear'd with the rest of the Army upon the Top of an Hill, no less to the Joy of the Emperor than the Terror of the Inhabitants, who notwithstanding refus'd to surrender, tho', the better to induce 'em to it, they had receiv'd very advantageous Conditions from the Emperor; and he, being provok'd at their Obstinacy, gave Orders for a general Attack. Tho' the Enemy's Resolution appear'd as great as their Obstinacy had done before, yet the Valour of the Romans at length prevail'd, and all Parts of the City, which was taken by Storm, were fill'd with Slaughter. Whilst some of the Romans were busied in Scaling the Walls, and open'd the Gates to their Fellows, eight thousand Scythians, part of the Garrison that had been left for the Defence of the Place, seiz'd on the Castle, from whence they did great Mischief upon the Imperialists, before they were well sensible by whom, or from what Part they were assaulted. Zimisces, who thought the Business had been over, when once he got in Possession of the City, found the greatest Danger remain'd still behind; and observing his Men declin'd the Assault, not so much from an Apprehension of their Enemy's Courage, as the Situation of the Place, which they judg'd impregnable, advanc'd in Person at the Head of 'em with Sword in Hand, and seem'd, by his own Courage, to upbraid 'em of Cowardice; the Sense which wrought so effectually upon 'em, that they all strove who should first thrust himself betwixt their Prince and the Danger that threaten'd him, and so, after a terrible Slaughter on both Sides, they became Masters of the Castle. Those of the Scythians that were not kill'd in the Assault, were either driven down the Rocks and Precipices, or intercepted by the Fire, which prevail'd on every side, so that very few or none of 'em escap'd.

Thus

Thus was Zimisces become Master of the City and Castle in the Space of two Days ; all those that were found upon their Arms were kill'd, and the Women and Children, together with such as yielded themselves after the first Fury was over, were made Prisoners ; among whom was Borises, King of the Bulgarians, who being conducted to the Emperor in his Royal Robes, was receiv'd by him as a King, and after a magnificent Entertainment releas'd with his Wife and Children, and all the Bulgarians, Zimisces declaring he had an Enmity to none but the Russi. The City, whom the Heat of the Soldiers had almost destroy'd, was repair'd at the Emperor's Charge, and call'd after his own Name, Joannopolis. Here he kept his Easter, and having left a sufficient Garrison in it, and furnish'd it with all manner of Provisions, he march'd from thence towards Dorostorum, or Distra, seated on the Ister, and one of the chief Towns the Russians had in this Country, which their General was very solicitous to preserve. He encamp'd with his numerous Army, consisting in all of 330000 Men, within twelve Miles of that City, where it was unanimously resolv'd to wait the Emperor's coming, and give him Battel ; having first put three hundred Bulgarians to Death, of whom they had entertain'd some Suspicion. The Russians did not so much exceed the Romans in Numbers, as the Romans, encourag'd by their late Victories, surpass'd them in Courage, upon which Account the Success continu'd doubtful for a long time on both sides. Fortune seem'd no less than twelve times to shift Parties ; but, as Night approach'd, the Left Wing of the Russians began to give Ground ; and before the Enemy had leisure to recruit it the Emperor led on a reserv'd Party with so much Resolution, that his Soldiers, receiving new Life from his Example, bore on with an invincible Courage upon the Barbarians, and carry'd the Day. The Russians fled with their broken Troops to Distra, not so much for the Defence of the City, as their own Security ; and

and thither the Emperor, after he had return'd Publick Thanks for the Victory, follow'd 'em, and laid close Siege to the Place, but made no Attempt upon it 'till the Arrival of his Fleet, which prevented the Defendants escaping by the River.

The Siege
of Dibra.

This Siege prov'd as remarkable as any that Age produc'd, not so much for the Length of it, as the Resoluteness of the Besieg'd, the Valour of the Assailants, and the Consequences of it; for it brought both Armies to a general Battel, and that introduc'd a Treaty, which ended in a Truce or Peace between both Nations. The Russians had hitherto forbore the use of Horses, but now, contrary to their former Custom, they mounted several Companies, and sally'd out briskly at two several Gates towards the Evening, when the Romans were dispers'd at Supper, little prepar'd for the Company of such Guests, so that the two Quarters, where the Onset was made, were at first seiz'd with a general Consternation; but having, by degrees, taken to their Arms, a sharp Engagement happen'd, in which at length the Romans had the Advantage, and forc'd the Enemy back, with a great Slaughter into the City, which was fill'd with hideous Cries and Howlings for the Loss they had sustain'd, by which the Garrison was extreamly weaken'd, so that the General was forc'd to send for all his Countrymen which were posted in the Adjacent Towns and Forts, having some time before committed to Custody twenty thousand Bulgarians for fear they should revolt, or raise a Mutiny in the Garrison. Zimisces, observing the Resolution with which the General behav'd himself, and dreading the Fatigues of a long Siege, drew his Army out into the adjoining Plain, and offer'd him Battel, which he refus'd, resolving to maintain himself to the last Extremity within the Walls. Notwithstanding which, being strengthen'd with fresh Supplies, they issu'd out one Night at all their Gates at once, and made a great Sally upon the Besiegers at a time when they little expected pected 'em. At first, the Romans being unprepar'd to receive 'em, they had the Advantage; but Phagellus, who had been exchange'd, and now commanded 'em, being Slain, they grew dishearten'd, and fought with less Alacrity; however they kept the Field all that Night, and 'till Noon the Day following, when perceiving a Party was got between them and the Town, they began to shift every one for himself, and being intercepted by the Romans in their Way back, they stragled in small Parties through the Country, where most of them were slain. This Loss oblig'd Sphendosth-labus their General more strongly to fortifie the Place, so that he drew a Trench about the Walls, and with several Works secur'd it. Finding his Provisions began to fall short, and that all Parts towards the Land were block'd up, he took the Advantage of a dark rainy Night, and pass'd with two thousand Men in Boats down the River, and got Corn and other Necessaries for the Garrison without being observ'd or distrusted by the Besiegers, 'till at his Return he kill'd many of those that had been sent out to Forage, and got out of Danger before the rest could escape with the News of their Defeat to the Emperor; who, being highly incens'd at it, threaten'd the Commanders of his Fleet with Death, if they suffer'd the like for the future; and being unwilling to spend any more time in fruitless Hostilities, he secur'd all the Avenues leading to the Town, and resolv'd to starve 'em out of it. The Besieg'd, beginning once more to be straighten'd in their Provisions, resolv'd to make a general Sally upon the Enemy, under the Conduct of Fernor, who was the second in Reputation among 'em. The Dispute for some time was very obstinate on both sides, 'till Anemas, the Son of the Ameras, or Caliph of Crete, who had been entertain'd in the Emperor's Guards, singl'd out Fernor, and after a short Combat slew him, at which the Besieg'd retir'd back in great Confusion, and suffer'd more from the straitness of the Ways, whereby they tramp'd one upon upon another, than the Swords of the Pursuers. Sphen-dostblabus himself got with much difficulty into the Town, where he at last began to consider in what a melancholy Condition his Affairs stood. His Countrymen, that were either able or willing to relieve him, were at too great distance, and the neighbouring Nations were aw'd by the Emperor, who was too powerful for 'em both by Sea and Land. The Besieg'd labour'd under the greatest Difficulties, their Numbers were considerably diminish'd, and the want of all things necessary for their Subsistence grew every Day more and more upon 'em, whilst the Emperor, on the other side, receiv'd continual Supplies of Men and Provisions. Hereupon a Council of War was summon'd, wherein, tho' they severally differ'd in the Method, yet they generally agreed in this, that the War must be brought to a Conclusion. Some were for flying away by Night, others for Capitulating, and a few mov'd for a pitch'd Battel, affirming any other Methods would expose 'em to the Derision of their Neighbours, and concluded that a glorious Death was preferable to an ignominious Life. To this Opinion the General himself adher'd, so that they all agreed unanimously to quit the City the next Day, and, that their Men might fight with a more desperate Courage, they resolv'd to make fast the Gates of the City, and cut off all hopes of a Retreat.

Another
Sally.

As this Battel concluded the War, so was it the most remarkable of any that happen'd in it. The Season of the Year was very hot, which exceedingly distress'd the Romans, who were not so much accusom'd to the Inconveniences of the Weather, so that the indulgent Emperor carefully reliev'd 'em with Bottles of Wine and Water mix'd together; besides, the Ways where the Fight began were too narrow for 'em to draw up in a regular Body, of which he being sensible, commanded his Officers to retire by degrees 'till they came into the open Plain, and then to fall on again with their usual Alacrity. The Enemy, thinking they fled, with an indiscreet Courage pursu'd 'em, 'till the Romans, having attain'd the Place appointed, charg'd 'em afresh and renew'd the Fight. Zimisces, observing that the Russians, notwithstanding this Advantage, fought with more Courage than ever, commiserated the Condition of his Men; and, to prevent the Effusion of more Blood, sent and challeng'd their General to decide the Quarrel by a single Combat between 'em. Sphendostblabus as arrogantly rejected the Offer, and return'd Answer, That he knew how to put a better Value upon his Life, and that if the Emperor was weary of his, there was room enough for him in the Field to dispose of it. Hereupon Zimisces resolv'd, with this one Day's Action, to finish both the War and the Siege, and therefore having sent Sclerus with his Troops to cut off their Communication with the Town, he commanded Romanus, the Son of Constantine Cæsar, and Grandson of Romanus the elder, together with Peter, another great Commander in the Army, to give a fresh Charge with their reserv'd Forces; notwithstanding which the Success continu'd still uncertain, 'till Sphendostblabus was in the end beat off his Horse by Anemas, who, whilst he was endeavouring to kill him, was himself cut to pieces. The Russians, who before the Fight were half starv'd, began now to grow weary and dishearten'd; on the other side the Romans, observing the Confusion and Disorder they were in, continu'd the Fight with great Alacrity, 'till the Russians gave way, and fled with great Precipitation over the Plain, where the Slaughter was continu'd by the victorious Pursuers; an innumerable Multitude of 'em fell in the Fight, and hardly any escap'd without being wounded. When the Romans came to strip the Slain, they found great Numbers of Women among 'em, who had accompany'd their Husbands in Mens Cloaths, and fought with a Masculine Courage. And 'twas observable, that during this whole War, the
to

The Russians entirely defeated.

Women,

A. D. 971. Women, for their Numbers; had been as serviceable as the Men; so resolute were these People to maintain and defend, to the last Extremity, what they thought their own by Right of Conquest.

Sphendostblabus, having secur'd himself with the rest by Flight for the present, consulted what farther was to be done. He consider'd he had acted hitherto in every thing as became a prudent Man, and a Lover of his Country, and that Fortune had still oppos'd him in all his Designs, so that there was nothing more left him to do, but to obtain the best Terms he could from the Emperor, of whom he requir'd more than he thought Zimisces would grant, or that he himself could expect, proposing to abate and govern himself according to the Answer he should receive from the Emperor; for he demanded no less than
 “ To be receiv'd on the publick Faith as a Friend
 “ and Allie of the Empire; that he and his Country“ men should be conducted in Safety home, and that “ a free Commerce should be settled betwixt both “ Nations. Tho' Sphendostblabus would willingly have relinquish'd part of these Demands, yet the Emperor, who was either grown weary of the War, or thought it imprudent or dangerous to provoke a desperate Enemy, who had given him such undeniable Instances of his Courage and Resolution, generously granted all he ask'd, alledging, in his Defence, the Custom of the Ancient Romans, who chose rather to overcome their Enemies by their Kindness and Generosity, than by the Force of their Arms. The Articles of the Treaty being settled, Sphendostblabus desir'd he might have an Interview with the Emperor, which, being readily granted, he was receiv'd and entertain'd with great Magnificence. At this Interview it was agreed between 'em, that the Patzinacæ should be compriz'd in the League, which was thought would induce 'em to grant the Russians liberty to return through their Territories into their own Country. The Patzinacæ appear'd willing to be comcomprehended in the Treaty, but refus'd a free Passage to the Russians, who, if they found them obstinate, were oblig'd, in the Condition they were in, to force their Way through; of which the Patzinacæ being inform'd, they thought it not Prudence openly to oppose 'em, but, laying Ambushes for 'em, they cut off the General and all his Men; that fierce People thinking it a Crime sufficient that he had enter'd into a League with the Romans.

Thus ended the Russian War, not more to the Honour and Safety of the Empire, than the Reputation of Zimisces, who ascrib'd his Success rather to the Divine Protection than the Force of his Arms: For besides that, during the late Battel, the Wind blew the Rain with great Violence full against the Barbarians, which extreamly disorder'd 'em, and made 'em unable to manage the Fight as they at first intended: Some related, that a Man on a White Horse was observ'd by the whole Army at the beginning of the Fight, who fought at the Head of the Battel, and with his single Valour repuls'd and broke the Enemy's Ranks, and forasmuch as none had seen him either before or afterwards, they believ'd him to be St. Theodore the Martyr, on whose Anniversary the Victory was obtain'd, and the Emperor himself (who, faith my Author, never fought without the immediate Protection and Assistance of those Heavenly Auxiliaries) according to the Superstitions of those Times, either really did, or at least pretended so far to believe it, that he repair'd a Church dedicated to him, and chang'd the Name of the Town, wherein it stood, from Euchaneia to Theodoropolis.

The Treaty being sign'd, the Emperor fortify'd all the Towns and Forts that stood upon the River, and then return'd to Constantinople, where he was receiv'd with all Expressions of Joy imaginable. The Patriarch, the Clergy, the Senate, and the People met him with Crowns, and a triumphant Chariot drawn by four Horses most splendidly caparison'd; he refusing to en-

Baron An.
911.

Zimisces
his Tri- umph at
Constantinople.

ter the City in the Chariot, mounted a white Horse, and having put the Royal Vestments of the Bulgarian Princes into the Chariot, and over them the Image of the Virgin Mary, as Protectress of the City, he follow'd it in a solemn Procession, and in the Forum receiv'd the Acclamations of the People.

The Solemnity being over, and he in a manner releas'd from the Toils of War, he apply'd himself, with great Diligence, to the Affairs of State. He eas'd his Subjects of some Taxes, and was the first that commanded the Image of our Saviour to be impress'd upon the Coins with this Impression, Jesus Christ, the King of Kings, which Custom was ever after observ'd by his Successors. But whilst he was thus employ'd in his Management at home, several of those Cities in the East, that had been reduc'd by his Predecessor Nicephorus, revolted from the Empire, and took up Arms against it, so that Zimisces saw himself oblig'd to undertake another Expedition to recover 'em to their Obedience. And having proceeded as far as Damascus, he reduc'd some by fair Words, and others by force of Arms. Here he resided for some time to settle the Affairs of the Province in those Parts. In this Expedition having observ'd several pleasant Towns and Palaces, with large and fruitful Territories adjoining to 'em, and being delighted with it, he ask'd to whom they belong'd; and when he was answer'd that Basilus, the President, was in Possession of 'em all, tho' some of 'em had been acquir'd by the Arms of Nicephorus, others by other Generals, and not a few by himself, he broke out with a Sigh into this Expression, How miserable, my Companions, is the present Condition of the Roman Empire, whose best blood and Treasure is sacrific'd to the Pride and Ambition of an aspiring Eunuch? Basilus had serv'd several of the former Emperors in their Wars against the Saracens, and in Negotiations of the greatest Importance. Being a Man of great Authority in the Empire he appear'd very instrumental in the Promotion of Ni- cephorus,

cephorus, who, upon that Consideration, made him his prime Minister, in which Post he was continu'd by Zimisces, out of Respect to his reputed Integrity, and great Knowledge, and Experience in the Affairs of State, which he knew how to manage with the greatest dexterity, tho', like most other Statesmen, he took care to enrich himself; and indeed they, who watch with an uncorrupted Eye for the Safety of the State, are in some measure worthy of their Hire. Basilus was quickly inform'd of the Emperor's Reflection, and, apprehending the Consequences of it, if not prevented in Time, he resolv'd to build his own Security upon the Destruction of the Emperor. Accordingly he prevail'd with his Cup-bearer to give him a Poison, and such a one as should work by degrees, and in a languishing Manner dispatch him. The Cup-bearer being encourag'd by large Presents in Hand, and larger Promises, readily undertook it. The Poison work'd so effectually upon the Emperor, that he dy'd before he could reach Constantinople. It broke out in large Carbuncles upon his Shoulders, and made him void great quantities of Blood at his Eyes. Whether he mistrusted the Treason had been acted against him, or judg'd it a natural Distemper, he forbore any Inquisition about it, and spent the Time he had to live in his Devotions.

Zimisces
poison'd.

This was the End of an Emperor, whose Virtues and fortunate Reign deserv'd a better Conclusion. For he must, on all Hands, be allow'd to have been an excellent Prince, tho' they, who raise themselves up to the Government by violent Means, as he did, are not always known to execute it with Justice and Moderation. The ambitious Thirst after Sovereignty was not reputed so great a Crime in those Days, as it is deservedly esteem'd now; and that Consideration may, in a great Measure, plead in his Behalf. He was as renown'd for his Devotion as his Courage, and was a visible Example of both to all his Subjects, tho'

A. D.
976.

he excell'd in no Christian Virtue so much as in that of Mercy and Forgiveness. As he was vigorous and active in enlarging the Territories of the Empire, so was he equally vigilant in protecting and securing them. A Comet was seen some time before his Death, and continu'd to appear for several Months after it, foreshowing, as it was afterwards thought, not only the Fall of this Emperor, but those fatal Distempers in which the State, by reason of the Civil Wars that rag'd within its Bowels, was afterwards involv'd. The Years of Zimisces his Reign, and that wherein he dy'd, are differently computed by different Authors; the most probable Account is, that he reign'd six Years and as many Months, and that he dy'd in the fourth Year of Otto, Emperor of Germany; the second of Benedict the seventh Pope of Rome, A. D. 976.

Basilius II.
Constantine VII.

Zimisces, before his Death, design'd Basilius and Constantine, the Sons of Romanus, his Successors, who in his Life-time had been his Collegues in the Empire. These two Princes, the Eldest of which was about twenty, and the other seventeen Years of Age, bore the Name of Emperors, but the Imperial Power lodg'd solely in Basilius the President, who, the better to preserve himself in the Authority he had so long enjoy'd, recall'd Theophania, the young Prince's Mother, who had been banish'd by Zimisces; by which Act he confirm'd himself in the good Opinion of the Sons, and reconcil'd himself to the Mother, who had before been highly offended at him.

A. D.
976.

The beginning of this Reign was attended with extraordinary Commotions in the State, occasion'd chiefly by the Minority of the two Princes, and the over great Jealousie of the Prime Minister, who, to prevent any Usurpations that might arise, took care first to restrain the almost unlimited Power of Bardas Sclerus. Sclerus his great Command in the Army, and his Interest in the Soldiers, among whom he had been bred up from his Youth, had encourag'd him to some ambitious Attempts in the late Reign, for which he

nar.

narrowly escap'd the Loss of his Eyes. Zimisces, being a Prince of a forgiving Temper, restor'd him in a short Time to his Favour, and left him at his Death Commander in Chief of all the Forces in the East, which gave him an Opportunity of inclining the Soldiers to whatever Designs it was his Interest to promote. Upon these Considerations Basilus took from him his Command in the East, and sent him Governor into Mesopotamia, with Orders to restrain the Incursions of the Saracens. Sclerus at first disputed these Orders, and broke out into bitter Invectives against Basilus, who, unmov'd at his Reproaches, threaten'd to strip him of all his Employments, and confine him to his own House, unless he instantly obey'd. Hereupon he thought it prudent to depart into the Province that had been assign'd him, carrying with him a fix'd Resolution of revenging himself upon the Prime Minister with the first Opportunity, and asserting his own Right. Accordingly he acquainted the Chief Officers of the Army with his Design, who either out of Hatred to Basilus, or knowing that all the Soldiers were at Sclerus his Devotion, promis'd faithfully to adhere to him, and advis'd him openly to declare against the Government, and set up for himself. Romanus, the Son of Sclerus, was at that Time in Constantinople, so that he dar'd attempt nothing 'till he had recover'd him from thence, which being done in a short Time after, he then openly assumed the Habit, and was saluted Emperor by the whole Army. Sclerus Usurps.

The better to maintain himself in his usurp'd Authority he seiz'd on the publick Revenues, and rais'd large Contributions from such as were rich and able to pay him. By this means he collected immense Sums of Money, which enabled him to support the Charge of the War, and secur'd the Friendship of the Saracens his Neighbours, who, observing the promising Face of his Affairs, enter'd into a Treaty with him, which was strengthen'd by closer Alliances of Marriage, by Virtue of which he receiv'd from 'em great Supplies of Money and Horfe. With these Preparations he set forward, in the beginning of Spring, towards Constantinople, to the great Terror and Consternation of those who were well-affected to the present Government, and dreaded the Consequences of an Innovation. All Means were try'd to divert the impending Storm : Basilius sent Orders to Peter, who had succeeded Sclerus in the Command of the East, to raise all the Forces he could, and muster the whole Army at Cæsarea. At the same Time Syncellus, Bishop of Nicomedia, was sent to try if by his prevailing Eloquence, for which he was highly esteem'd, he could persuade Bardas to quit his unjust Pretensions, and submit to the Government. The Usurper, adorn'd with the Imperial Ornaments, heard him with Patience, but answer'd him in short, That having once worn the Purple he would never quit it, but with his Life ; That he was the lawful Roman Emperor, and would oblige those by Force to submit to his Authority, who now unadvisedly presum'd to oppose it. As soon as the Court had receiv'd this Answer, Peter was order'd to secure all the Passages, and make the best Defence he could if he should be attack'd, but by no means to begin the War himself. Hereupon he posted Parties in all the Passes, which Sclerus endeavour'd by slight Skirmishes to gain, but to no purpose, 'till at length, after several Marches and Countermarches, they came to encamp one against the other : Sclerus sat still for some Time, and seem'd desirous to decline fighting, 'till some of his Friends represented to him how dangerous Delays would prove to him, and how much he would suffer in his Reputation, unless he enter'd immediately upon Action. Awaken'd by these Remonstrances he immediately dislodg'd, and march'd into Cappadocia, whither Peter follow'd him Night and Day, and at last came close up to him. Here both the Generals discover'd the same Averseness to fighting as they had done done before, endeavouring to circumvent each other by Stratagems, in which Sclerus prov'd the better Master. One Day he order'd Provisions to be prepar'd with a more superficial Care than usual, as if the whole Army was going to take a Refreshment, tho' at the same Time he order'd all his Men to stand to their Arms, and be ready for the Word. This being observ'd by Peter, who, for the most part, had been upon the Defensive, he concluded there would be no Engagement that Day, and therefore order'd his Soldiers to fill their Bellies, and take their Ease. Whilst they were thus employ'd Sclerus fell upon 'em in a regular Order, and tho' such of 'em as could take to their Arms made a resolute Resistance, yet in the end they were overpower'd and put to flight. Sclerus took their Camp, and all their Baggage, in which he found much Treasure. This Success seem'd, in a great measure, to confirm Sclerus in his usurp'd Authority; for many Persons of great Reputation in the Army, and Interest in the Provinces, renounc'd their Allegiance, and declar'd for him: The Inhabitants of Attala laid hold of Michael Curticas, the Emperor's Admiral, and carry'd the Fleet over to Sclerus, who order'd 'em to make War with it against the Cibyrræotæ.

*Sclerus
beats the Emperor's
Forces.*

When the News of this Defeat was brought to Constantinople, it was entertain'd there with the greatest Consternation imaginable. Leo was chosen to act with an unlimited Authority against Sclerus, like the Dictators of old under the Common-wealth; and John, a Patrician, a Man of great Eloquence and Experience, was join'd in the Commission with him to counsel and assist him. Leo, having join'd Peter in Phrygia, try'd first, by gentle Means and fair Promises, to draw the Usurper's Adherents off from him; but when he found all his Attempts that way were ineffectual, he broke up suddenly, and march'd with great Expedition towards the East; at which Sclerus and his Associates were exceedingly perplex'd, because all the Treasure, and most of their Relations had been left in those Parts; the Consideration of which wrought so wonderfully upon some of the Principal among 'em, that they left the Usurper, and fled over to Leo. Sclerus found himself so weaken'd by such an unexpected Defection, that he began to despair of Success, and grew fearful lest all his Forces would, by degrees, draw off and disperse themselves. The only Remedy left in such a Conjunction, was to send a Body of Men, under the Command of such Officers as he could entirely confide in, who shou'd endeavour to stop Leo's Progress. They were order'd to intercept the Provisions for the Army, and by repeated Alarms, and sudden Onsets, continually incommode him, but by no means suffer it to be brought to a general Engagement. They for some time carefully observ'd their Orders, but were at last forc'd to venture a set Battel. For the Soldiers hearing the Saracens of Berrhæa were shortly to pass between both Armies, with the annual Tribute, in their way to Constantinople, would not be restrain'd; but, knowing they who were strongest in the Field would, in all probability, be Masters of that Treasure, they fell on with an intemperate Heat, whereupon a general Engagement follow'd, in which Leo had the Advantage. Many of Sclerus his Men were slain, especially of the Armenians, to whom no Quarter would be allow'd, because they were the first that had revolted to him. But Leo with much Caution and Discretion declin'd fighting; for he knew, and found by Experience, that his Strength encreas'd daily by the Accession of such, who, in that melancholy Condition of his Affairs, deserted the Usurper. Had he persisted in that Resolution, he had, in all probability, put an end to the War at once; but he had some Hot-headed Vain-glorious young Men in his Army, who condemn'd him of too much Diffidence, and never gave over 'till they had persuaded him, contrary to his former Intentions, and much against gainst his Will to engage. Sclerus had much the Advantage of Leo in his Cavalry, which, being plac'd at each Wing of his Army, made their Enemies give Ground at the first Onset, which occasion'd a total Defeat. The Action was very hot for the time it lasted; on Leo's side, John his Coadjutor, and Peter, and several other Persons of eminent Quality, were slain: Leo himself was taken Prisoner, together with a great many more of distinguish'd Rank in the Army. This remarkable Victory was obtain'd with little or no Loss on the side of Sclerus, who digg'd out the Eyes of some of his Prisoners at the Head of his Army, because, in Breach of their Oaths to him, they had fallen off to Leo. Leo and some others he treated with more Humanity, and only kept 'em in an honourable Restraint.

Sclerus his Generals
Defeated,

Tho' the Usurper seem'd, by this last Advantage, to have the whole Empire at his Devotion, and thought himself by this Time above all Competition, yet Basilius the President omitted nothing of his usual Care for the Safety of the Empire, and Preservation of the Princes. Observing what Mischief Sclerus his Ships did at Sea, that having wasted all the Islands in the Hellespont they threaten'd Abydos, which would bring Constantinople it self into manifest Danger, he fitted out a strong Fleet, with which Theodorus Caren-tenus, a Patrician, who commanded it, engag'd the Enemy at Phocæa, and destroy'd or took most of their Vessels, by which means the Seas were clear'd, and the Coasts secur'd. At the same Time Basilius recruited his Land-Forces, and finding the Usurper had a Design upon Nice, the Metropolis of Bitbrynia, he sent away Manuel Eroticus with a good Body of Forces to command in it. Sclerus, being animated by his late Success, fell with great Violence upon the Place, thinking to carry it with little or no Opposition; but met with so vigorous a Repulse, that he thought it the safest and most effectual way to starve him out. Manuel, who was sensible of the great Necessities to which

but he again routs
the Imperialists.

He takes Nice.

Phocas
declar'd
General against him,

which the Inhabitants and Garrison must in time be reduc'd, fill'd the empty Granaries of the City with Sand, over which he strow'd what Corn was left so thick, that the Sand could not be discover'd by an incurious Eye. Having stor'd the Granaries in this manner he show'd 'em to some Prisoners he had taken, to whom he represented how difficult a thing it would be for Sclerus to force a Place by Famine, that was provided with so much Plenty. He added, that considering the doubtful Events of War, he was willing to surrender the Town upon certain Conditions ; some of which were, That the Garrison might have leave to depart with their Arms and Baggage, and pass unmolested to Constantinople. Sclerus embrac'd the Proposal with a ready Consent, and so became Master of Nice by a Compliance, of which he was afterwards ashamed. However this Progress of his Arms, which began to extend themselves on every side, added much to the Reputation of his Cause, and confirm'd his Party. He now threaten'd to march to Constantinople it self, where several that secretly wish'd him well, expected him with great Impatience, and were prepar'd to declare openly for him at his first Appearance. Basilus, the President, being sensible of the Danger, and with what an experienc'd, as well as powerful Enemy he had to contend, recall'd Bardas Phocas from Exile, and made him General of the War against Sclerus, thinking him the only Man in the Empire able to contend with him. Phocas, having receiv'd full Instructions, got with great Expedition to Cæsarea, where Eustathius Malenius, and Michael Burtzas, who had hitherto adher'd to Sclerus, being inform'd of Phocas his Arrival, quitted the Usurper, and came to join with Phocas; who, having muster'd all the Forces he could collect at Cæsarea, march'd on to Amorium, whither he was immediately follow'd by Sclerus, who thought it now no time to be idle, having to contend with so celebrated an Enemy. Here it appear'd evident, that neither the Courage,

Courage, Reputation, or Experience of a General, can infuse a generous Resolution into the Minds of those whom former Defeats have disperited ; for both Armies coming to an Engagement Phocas his Forces were defeated, and driven out of the Field ; tho' in this, and another Engagement that follow'd soon after, in which he was again worsted, Phocas discharg'd all the Offices of a valiant Soldier, and experienc'd Commander.

and is beaten by
Sclerus.

These two Actions had considerably impair'd Phocas his Army, which therefore he took care to recruit, whilst Sclerus went to encamp on a large Plain call'd Pancalea, lying upon the River Halys in Cappadocia. Phocas, having obtain'd Supplies out of Iberia and other Places, march'd in quest of his Enemy, to whom, as soon as he had found him, he offer'd Battel a third Time, which at the beginning inclin'd, as it had done in the former Engagements, and declar'd for Sclerus. Phocas, asham'd to be thus ignominiously beaten thrice together, having observ'd Sclerus at the Head of his Troops, ran with great Fury upon him, and resolv'd to conquer or perish. Sclerus, aware of his Design, gave the first stroke directed at his Adversary's Head, which missing, he cut off one of his Horse's Ears, whilst Phocas directed his Sword with a more steady Hand, and give him such a Wound that he sunk down upon his Horse's Neck, and Phocas rode up to a Hill with a Design to restrain the Flight of his Soldiers, who were by this Time all in Confusion. Sclerus his Servants concluding, that notwithstanding this desperate Attempt of Phocas, both he and his Cause were absolutely lost, conducted their fainting Master to a Fountain, there to refresh him and wash his Wound ; and either forgetting, or having never heard what had formerly happen'd upon the like Occasion, suffer'd his Horse, whose Mane was all bloody, to run in among the Soldiers, who immediately concluding the General was slain, quitted the Pursuit, and fled away themselves with so much haste, that many of them fell down

who is at last overthrown.

down vast Precipices, and others took the River, wherein they were drown'd; which fatal Mistake turn'd the Fortune of the Day, and gave the Victory to Phocas. So cautious ought Men to be in all the Circumstances of Life, more especially in the Field of Battel, where Courage is necessary, but Presumption dangerous.

Flying to Babylon
he is clap'd
up in Prison.

This unexpected, but decisive Victory, entirely broke the Party of Sclerus, who escap'd with a few to Martyropolis, and from thence to Babylon, where he implor'd the Friendship and Assistance of Chosroes, Sultan of the Place. The Emperor Basilus, being inform'd of Phocas his Success, and that Sclerus was fled to Babylon, sent his Ambassadors to Chosroes, who represented to him of what dangerous Consequence it would be for a Prince to favour and protect those whom Disloyalty and Rebellion had driven from home. At the same time he sent Letters to Sclerus, and those that were with him, in which he offer'd 'em a full Pardon for what was pass'd, if they would renounce their Pretensions and return home. Of this Chosroes being inform'd, he was enrag'd at the double Errand of the Ambassadors, and clapp'd both them and Sclerus in Prison, from whence we shall see Fortune will, in a short time, release him to create new Disturbances in the Empire.

Thus was this first Civil War fortunately suppress'd at the Expence of much Blood and Treasure; and Basilus the Emperor, who, during Sclerus his Rebellion, had receiv'd sufficient Provocations from the restless Spirits of the Bulgarians, thought himself now at leisure to chastise 'em. Hitherto hardly any thing, relating either to Peace or War, had been undertaken without the Knowledge and Approbation of the President; but now the Emperor began to reflect upon his own Power, and judg'd himself capable to manage this War without his Interposition, and so resolv'd to march in Person against 'em. This was undertaken with the Participation of a very few; neither neither Phocas the General, nor any of the other Captains in the East, being acquainted with it. The Emperor enter'd Bulgaria thro' the Country lying near Rhodoptes, and the River Eurus, leaving Leo Melissenus to secure the Straits behind him, whilst he prepar'd to lay Siege to Sardica. This Expedition had in all probability succeeded according to his Desire and Expectation, had not some unhappy Divisions between his chief Officers frustrated his Designs. As he was vigorously preparing for the Siege, Stephen, the Commander of the Western Forces, and profess'd Enemy to Leo Melissenus, came to him in the dead of Night, which added to the Horror of what he was to unfold, and earnestly conjur'd him to lay all other Designs whatsoever aside, and break up immediately for Constantinople, because Leo intended to usurp the Imperial Authority, and was accordingly marching with all Expedition to the City. This was urg'd by Stephen with so plausible an Air, that the young Emperor, who, besides the Danger he apprehended from a Competitor in the State, was afraid lest Melissenus having deserted his Post, he might be intercepted in his Retreat, in a great Fright gave Orders for the Army to march; which Samuel, the Prince of the Bulgarians observing, he watch'd his Opportunity, and fell upon 'em as they were making a disorderly Retreat, and turn'd it into a shameful Flight. The Emperor escap'd with great Difficulty to Philippopolis, where he found Leo carefully attending his Duty at the Station had been assign'd him, which made him sensible how insolently he had been affronted and abus'd, how infamous and ridiculous this Expedition would appear, and how much Stephen had deserv'd to be punish'd by him. Stephen's invincible Hatred to Leo made him with great Confidence defend what he had done, which provok'd the Emperor to leap from his Seat, and catching fast hold of him by his Locks and Beard to drag him down to the Ground. So dangerous is it for Princes to make

Choice

Basilus
the Emperor enters Bulgaria,

but returns
with Disbonour.

Choice of such for their Ministers, who being implacable Enemies to each other, are not like to unite in their Councils for the Service of their Master: For few Men are found so good Patriots as to sacrifice their private Interest, Pride, or Revenge, to the good of the Publick.

A. D.
987.

Phocas
proclaim'd Emperor by the Malecontentents.

This Bulgarian Expedition was not more ill concerted in the Beginning, or ignominious in the Conclusion, than it was mischievous in its Consequences. Phocas the General was highly affronted, for that the Emperor should dare to undertake a Thing so considerable without his Participation, and judg'd that, being a young and vigorous Prince, he would act for the future without any regard had to his Council or Authority. These Suggestions he endeavour'd to insinuate into the other General Officers of the Army, and they very readily entertain'd 'em: So that meeting at the House of Eustathius Malenius, a proud factious Man, they unanimously proclaim'd Phocas Emperor, and invested him with the Imperial Ornaments. At the same time that the Court receiv'd News of this Revolt, Advice was brought that Sclerus, being deliver'd out of Prison, was returning into the Empire. They who were well affected to the Emperors, Basilus and Constantine, judg'd this a favourable Conjunction, since it was easier to suppress two Pretenders than oppose one.

Sclerus ow'd his Release to the Dangers which at that Time threaten'd the Saracen State. The Persians, who had by degrees been subdu'd, and were entirely Slaves to that Nation, observing the Imprudence and Inactivity of Chosroes their present Sultan, bore the Yoke with much Reluctancy; watching therefore their Opportunity they arose suddenly, and massacred all the Saracens they met. Chosroes made the best Defence he was able against so sudden and dangerous an Insurrection, but was so often defeated by 'em, that at length the very Name of a Persian sounded terrible to the Ears of a Saracen. In this Extremity he cast cast his Eyes upon the Romans his Prisoners; he consider'd 'em as unfortunate Heroes, who had deserv'd a better Fate than what they endur'd; that if Sclerus had not been a Man of Worth, Conduct, and Prudence, he never had been able to raise so considerable a Party in the Empire, and dispute the Imperial Title with the Emperor himself. Upon these Considerations he consented to release him, provided he would undertake the War against the Persians. Sclerus at first declin'd the Employment, but being highly encourag'd by Chosroes, who promis'd him extraordinary Advantages, he chearfully engag'd himself in it, but refusing to command any of Chosroes's own Subjects in the Service, he persuaded him to open all the Prisons, and arm the Captive Romans, who, making a Body of about three thousand Men, fell suddenly on the Persians, who being unus'd to their manner of Fighting, and over-power'd with their Courage, receiv'd a total Defeat. Sclerus, finding himself at the Head of so gallant a Body of Men, thought himself once more in a Capacity of renewing his former Pretensions, and therefore having put an end to the Persian War almost as soon as undertaken, he return'd with his victorious Army into the Territories of the Empire; whether with Chosroes's Consent, or against it, or rather after his Death, as it is very uncertain, so is it not worthy our Consideration. Being enter'd into the Dominions of the Empire, he was inform'd of Phocas his Ufurpation, which in a great Measure blasted his Hopes, and seem'd very prejudicial to the present Posture of his Affairs; for he found himself unable to oppose both, nor did he judge it safe or honourable for him to join himself with either. At length he resolv'd to carry himself as fair as he could with both, and so ingratiate himself with one, that the other should think he had no Reason to be offended; and therefore the same Time that he sent to Phocas, and offer'd to assist him in the Suppression of Basilus, and share the Empire with him, his Son Romanus left him by his own Consent,

*Sclerus returns into
the Empire.*

Consent, and under the Pretence of a Revolt went to Basilus at Constantinople. By this means, if Phocas prevail'd, the Father thought he should have Interest enough to procure the Son's Peace; and, if Basilus had the better, he hop'd his Son would be able to obtain his Pardon from the Emperor. Some Time before Romanus his Arrival, Basilus the President was fallen into Disgrace, for the Emperor thought himself old enough to govern without a Director, and the President thought he had a just Right to the Management, and made use of all the Artifices an old Courtier is capable of to continue himself in it. But Basilus was firmly resolv'd totally to shake him off, and confin'd him first to his own House, where, when he found the restless old Man was forming new Designs, he stripp'd him of all his vast Estate at once, at which he was so sensibly afflicted that he dy'd shortly after. Immediately upon this Romanus arriv'd, and the Emperor knowing him to be a prudent Man, and experienc'd Soldier, took him into his Favour, and preferr'd him to Employments of the highest Importance.

Tho' Basilus receiv'd Romanus with a generous Confidence, and made him his chief Favourite, the crafty Phocas behav'd himself with more Circumspection to Sclerus. At first he enter'd into a very formal Agreement with him, and pretended the Empire should be divided between 'em: Sclerus was to have for his Share Antioch, Phœnicia, Palestine, Cœlosyria, Mesopotamia and Egypt; and Constantinople, with the rest of the Provinces, was allotted to Phocas. This Agreement was ratify'd and confirm'd by Oaths on both sides, after which Sclerus made no difficulty of joining his Forces with those of Bardas; and in Capadocia a Council of War was held how to proceed with the best Advantage. Phocas, having by these means drawn the old Man into a senseless Security, watch'd his Opportunity, and then seiz'd upon him, stripp'd him of his Imperial Ornaments, and committed him to Custody; after which he found it no difficult

difficult Matter to prevail with his Troops to fight under him. By this time he thought he had sufficiently secur'd his own Interest, and therefore sent Calocyrrus Delphinus with part of his Army to Chrysopolis, whilst he remov'd with the rest to Abydos, intending to block up Constantinople. Upon the first Notice of these Motions, Basilus the Emperor sent Cyriacus his Admiral for the Defence of Abydos, and he himself passing over the Straits by Night, fell suddenly upon Delphinus, and routed him. Delphinus was taken Prisoner, with several others of great Note in the Army, who were all instantly nail'd up to several Posts, as an Example of Terror to the rest. Phocas met with a greater Resistance than he expected at Abydos, the Inhabitants of which Place were very much strengthen'd and encourag'd by the Arrival of the Imperial Fleet, which in a short time was follow'd by the Emperor Constantine, as he was immediately after by his Brother Basilus. Phocas, either in Contempt of the young Princes, or for that he thought it the safest way to fight before any more Forces could arrive to support 'em, left part of his Army to continue the Siege, and with the residue offer'd Battel to the Emperors. As he observ'd Basilus riding up and down to view his Troops, and encourage his Men, he prepar'd to single him out in the beginning of the Battel, and by his Death put an End to the Quarrel at once; for he look'd on Constantine as a weak intemperate Prince, who, if his Brother should be remov'd, would never be able to make Head against him. Accordingly he made towards him with all his Force, but Death stopp'd him in the midst of his Career. The manner of it is differently related: Some report his Horse threw him, others that some of the Emperor's Party gave him a Mortal Wound in his Passage; and the Emperor Constantine affirm'd, that he slew him with his own Hand; but the most receiv'd Opinion is, that he was poison'd by one Simeon, a Servant, in whom he repos'd

A. D.

989.

who dies of Poison.

an entire Trust, and that it was done at the Instigation of Basilus. However it was, the Death of Phocas purchas'd the Emperors an easie and compleat Victory ; for it was no sooner spread abroad in the Army, but his Men fled in all the Disorder imaginable. Most of the Principal among the Rebels were taken, and punish'd according to their Deserts; some sav'd themselves by a voluntary Exile, and others who had been the least active, were pardon'd.

Whereupon Sclerus is once more set at Liberty,

However there were still some remaining who preserv'd the Spirit of the Party after the Death of their Leader; these Men got Sclerus to be set at Liberty, and encourag'd him to pursue his Title, and valiantly assert his Right. Basilus, who had flatter'd himself that the Death of Phocas would put an end to the Civil Wars, observ'd a new Cloud gathering against him, which hung with a direful Aspect over the State. Before he thought fit to make use of violent means, he endeavour'd to reduce him by friendly Expostulations, and represented to him how unworthy it was for a Man of his Age and Profession to embroil the Empire with Blood; he promis'd an Indemnity for what was past, and his Favour and Protection for the future. To these Remonstrances Romanus added his earnest Persuasions ; he represented to his Father how well he had been receiv'd at Court, where he might promise himself the highest Preferments; that he was now old, and had not Forces sufficient to obtain his Ends; and that it would therefore more become him to enjoy the few Days he had yet in store in Honour, Peace and Tranquility. By these Persuasions Sclerus was induc'd to lay down his Pretensions. An Act of Indemnity was pass'd, and Sclerus being declar'd great Steward of the Household, was introduc'd to the Emperor, who could hardly restrain himself from laughing when he beheld him, of whom he had been for so long a time so much in fear. He was an exceeding decrepid old Man, supported by two of his Domesticks, who were forc'd to lead him by reason of his great Age and Corpulency. The Emperor reand is reconcil'd to

the Emperor.

ceiv'd

ceiv'd him with great Civility, made him eat with him at his own Table, confirm'd him in his Office of great Steward, and suffer'd such of his Followers as had enjoy'd any Offices of Honour and Profit under him, to be continu'd in 'em, or preferr'd to others of equal Value and Authority.

Basilus having by this Agreement, put an end to the Civil Wars, and secur'd himself from any farther Usurpations, consulted how he might best restrain and chastise the turbulent and unconquer'd Spirit of the Bulgarians, and such others who having form'd themselves into a League with their Neighbours, had taken their Advantage during the late Trouble, and infested the Borders of the Empire. He first took a Progress into Thrace and Macedonia, and having left a strong Party at Thessalonica to restrain the Inroads of Samuel, the King of Bulgaria, he shortly after march'd into Iberia, and from thence into Phœnicia, receiving Hostages from the Saracens of those Parts for their quiet Behaviour for the future. In his Passage thro' Cappadocia, Eustathius Melenus, a Commander in those Parts, entertain'd him and his whole Army; with which expensive Hospitality the Emperor seem'd outwardly to be very much pleas'd, but was inwardly concern'd to find any one Subject should be Master of so much Wealth, which could enable him to shake and endanger the Peace of the Empire. For this Reason, under a specious Pretext of a peculiar Esteem for him, he took him with him to Constantinople, from whence he would never after suffer him to return, but after his Death seiz'd on his vast Estate. A just Caution to those who endeavour to grow too wealthy and powerful for Subjects, by which means they generally become the Object of their Prince's Jealousie, and frequently of his Indignation.

Samuel hearing of the Garrison Basilus had left in Thessalonica, and being sensible how much the Possession of that Place would conduce to the Conquest of the whole Country, at which he aim'd, he plac'd part

Basilus
his Wars
with the Bulgari-
ans.

of his Army in ambush at a convenient distance from the Town, and order'd the rest to face it. The Governor was so far deluded by this Device, that he sent his Son out against him, who, being easily drawn into the Snare, was taken Prisoner, and his Father slain, as he was sallying out to his Assistance. Immediately upon this Thessalonica fell into the Hands of Samuel, who grew insolent upon his Success; and crossing the River Peneus made Inroads into Thessaly, Bætia, Attica, and the very Heart of Peloponnesus. Nicephorus Uranus, the Commander in chief of the Western Forces, was sent with a strong Army against him. Uranus observing the Disposition of Samuel's Forces, left his Baggage at Larissa; and having, by long Marches pass'd the Pharsalian Plains, and the River Apidanus, he encamp'd his whole Army on the Banks of Spercheius, directly opposite to Samuel. The River was at that time swoln so high with the great Rains, that Samuel thought it impossible for the Romans to pass it, and therefore lay with the greater Security on t'other side. But Uranus, after a long search, found out a Ford, and passing the River in the dead of Night, fell with great fury upon the Bulgarians as they lay asleep, and made great Havock among 'em. Samuel and his Son were both dangerously wounded, and had unavoidably been taken had they not lurk'd that Day among the Slain; the Night following they stole away to the Mountains of Ætolia, and from thence they escap'd with much difficulty into Bulgaria, where Samuel was forc'd to marry the Captive Son of the late Governor of Thessalonica to his only Daughter, who was so desperately in Love with him, that she declar'd she would destroy her self unless her Father would permit her to be marry'd to him. The Nuptial Solemnity being over, his new Son-in-Law was sent to reside with his Wife at Dyrrachium, of which Place Samuel appointed him Governor: But he had not been long there before he found an Opportunity of returning to Constantinople, where both he and his Wife, who readily attended him

him thither, were honourably receiv'd, and preferr'd by the Emperor.

After this Samuel's Affairs continu'd to be in a declining Condition 'till his Death, and the Emperor gain'd some considerable Advantage in every Expedition he undertook against him. He took Vidina from him by Storm; and having routed his Army, which lay with great Carelessness upon the Banks of the River Axis, he had the City Scopi, one of the strongest in those Parts, deliver'd up to him by Simeon the Governor, whom the Emperor rewarded with the Dignity of a Patrician. Samuel was so far dispirited by these frequent Defeats, that he durst no more venture his Fortune in the open Field, but endeavour'd to circumvent Basilius by Stratagem, and had cut him off with the greatest part of his Forces in the Straits of Cimba Longus, where he had plac'd a strong Guard, had not Nicephorus Xiphias, Governor of Philippopolis, with the Troops under his Command, gain'd a Hill, which lay towards the South, from whence he fell upon the Enemy's Rear, and gave Basilius an easie Entrance into the Straits; immediately upon which the Bulgarians turn'd their Backs, and fled away in the greatest Confusion. Many of 'em were kill'd in the Chace, and Samuel very narrowly escap'd thro' the Valour and Conduct of his Son, who, with much difficulty carry'd him off into the Castle of Prilapus, or Prailaba in Valachia. Basilius caus'd the Eyes of all his Prisoners, of whom he had many Thousands, to be pluck'd out; and to every hundred he assign'd a Man who had one Eye left, who had Orders to conduct 'em to Samuel. Samuel being already broken with Age, and weary'd out by his Misfortunes, was not able to stand the Shock of so terrible a Spectacle, but fell down in a Swoon; and tho' those about him restor'd him to himself, by the helps of some strong Spirits, for the present, yet he dy'd within two Days after.

Tho' Basilius promis'd himself, from the Death of Samuel, no less than an entire Subjection of all Bulgaria, ria, which he afterwards effected, yet at first he met with many Difficulties, and receiv'd great Opposition from the Obstinacy of some, and Perfidiousness of others. Gabriel, the Son of Samuel, succeeded his Father as Prince of the Country; but being a Man of a mean Capacity, though remarkable for his prodigious Strength, he was shortly after murder'd by the Procurement of John Bladisthlabus, a Person nearly related to him, and whose Life he had formerly preserv'd. Basilus after his late Victory, had pursu'd his Conquests, and reduc'd several of the strong Castles and fortify'd Towns in the Country, in one of which he took some of the Principal Men among the Bulgarians, whom he kept with him as Instruments to facilitate his future Attempts. Here he receiv'd Letters from John, in which he inform'd him, that Gabriel being dead, the Bulgarian Kingdom was his, and promis'd to be have himself as the Emperor's Subject and Vassal. These Letters were follow'd shortly after with others from the Bulgarians, who own'd themselves Subjects to the Empire, and acknowledg'd a Submission accordingly. Basilus receiv'd the Messengers very graciously, and promis'd them his Favour and Protection; but being shortly after assur'd, that John had engag'd for more than ever he intended to perform, he return'd the Year following into Bulgaria, and resolv'd never to give over 'till he had entirely subdu'd it. For having invaded it so often in Person, he thought his Honour would never suffer him to be at rest 'till he had effected a final Conquest of it. Tho' the Emperor had most of the strong Holds of the Country in his Hands, and the Strength of the Bulgarian Army was broken in a great measure by the late Wars, yet he found it a thing highly difficult to subdue a People animated with the love of Liberty, which they maintain'd to the last Gasps, and defended their Country as others do single Towns, losing it by Piece-meal. But John being slain, after he had worn the Title of King and defended it with great Valour for two Years and about five Months,

The Bulgarians submit themselves to the Emperor.

Months, the Bulgarians at last sent their Deputies to the Emperor with Offers of a total and unfeigned Submission. Basilus receiv'd 'em with his usual Condescension, and conferr'd the Title of Patrician on all those that seem'd the most forward to comply, and surrender'd up their Castles to him. At Achridus, or Achris, one of the chief Cities of the Country, he was saluted with the general Acclamations of the People. There he seiz'd on the vast Treasure of the Bulgarian Princes, among which were several rich Crowns adorn'd with Pearl, and a great quantity of Gold, which he distributed as a Donative among his Soldiers. Shortly after this, being return'd to his Camp, the late King's Widow, attended by three of her Sons, and six Daughters, together with other Princes of the Blood, came up to him, and did him Homage. She had three other Sons by John, who at first fled up into the Mountains; but hearing how courteously the Emperor had receiv'd their Brethren, they voluntarily came down and submitted.

There now remain'd but one Man in all the Country capable of raising any Troubles, who had not submitted to Basilus: This was Ibatzes, a Man ally'd to the Royal Family, and one, who, during the late Wars, had given the World several Instances of his great Courage and Constancy. This Man refusing to submit to Necessity, or comply with the present posture of Affairs, seiz'd on a Mountain most difficult of Access, where he resolv'd to defend himself to the last extremity. This Obstinacy seem'd to put a dangerous stop to the Progress of the Emperor's Arms, and very much perplex'd him. He solicited him earnestly by Letter, to consider how rashly he had undertaken what in the end would draw inevitable Destruction down upon his Head, and concluded with large Promises of the mighty Advantages he had to expect from his Submission. Ibatzes continuing unmov'd with all the Emperor could suggest, Eustathius Daphnomelus, whom Basilus had lately made

A desperate Attempt.

Governor of Achris, undertook a thing no less dangerous in the Attempt, than extraordinary in the Execution. Ibatzes was known to have a particular regard for the Feast of the Assumption, to the Celebration of which Strangers, as well as Neighbours, were invited; and Daphnomelus, tho' not invited, ventur'd to be one among 'em. Being discover'd by the Sentinels, he declar'd openly who he was, and desir'd 'em to inform their Master that he was come to be his Guest at the Festival. Ibatzes, surpriz'd at his Boldness, who had thus unadvisedly thrown himself into an Enemy's Hands, receiv'd him very kindly; and, Morning-Prayer being over, follow'd him, at his Request, into a remote Place convenient for Daphnomelus his Design, where he pretended he had Matters of the highest Importance to communicate to him. Here Daphnomelus, who had two Men attending at some distance, and with whom he had concerted the Matter before, watch'd his Opportunity, and threw him suddenly to the Ground; the same Instant his Men came up, and thrusting their Cloaths violently into his Mouth, forc'd both his Eyes out of his Head. When that was done they all three drew their Swords, and got into one of the highest Chambers in the Castle, being prepar'd for the worst that could befall 'em. As soon as the Fact was known great Multitudes ran with a lamentable Outcry to the Castle, threat'ning the Villains, for so they call'd 'em, with the cruellest Death. Daphnomelus, having first encourag'd his Men to defend themselves to the utmost, and by the Motion of his Hand from the Window obtain'd Silence from the incens'd Mob, told 'em, That what was done proceeded not from any ill Will to the Person of Ibatzes, but a just Regard to the Emperor's Orders, who had commanded him to do it; That therefore they ought to consider him as no other than the Instrument of the Emperor's Pleasure, who had both the Power and the Will to vindicate his own Authority, and revenge whatever they should think fit upon that occasion to act against him and his two Servants; That for their Parts they were resolv'd to sell their Lives as dear as they could, and should die with this Satisfaction, that being oppress'd with Multitudes it would be uncertain, whether they should receive more Honour, or their Enemies Disgrace, in their Fall. The Multitude were so affected with a Speech spoken with such Resolution, that the most timorous among 'em withdrew immediately; and a few that were wiser than the rest congratulated Daphnomelus upon his Success, and promis'd an implicit Obedience to the Emperor for the future. Daphnomelus being thus deliver'd from the Danger that so eminently threaten'd him, led Ibatzes off without any Opposition to Basilus, who rewarded him with the Government of Dyrrachium, and all the rich Moveables of his Prisoner.

Basilus, having thus reduc'd Ibatzes, endeavour'd, in the best manner he could, to compose and settle the distracted Affairs of that Country; after which he return'd with his Prisoners, and several Hostages to Constantinople, where the People receiv'd him with a Joy and Satisfaction answerable to his Success.

A. D.
1019.

After the Conclusion of this War, which took up a great part of this Emperor's Reign, we meet with little memorable 'till his Death. The Nations adjoining to the Bulgarians, being less powerful, follow'd the same Fate, and did Homage to the Emperor. Some time before his Death, Xiphias, and Nicephorus the Son of Bardas Phocas, rais'd a Rebellion against him, taking the Advantage of the Emperor's Absence in an Expedition into Iberia: But Basilus, by his cunning Management, so far wrought upon them, that Xiphias circumvented Nicephorus, and slew him, by that means putting a stop to a Rebellion to which he had first given Life. Basilus proceeded with great Severity against all those that had engag'd themselves in this Rebellion, sparing none who appear'd in the least affected to it. As he declin'd in Years he grew more jealous and remorseless; his great Success in his Wars made him arrogant and untractable, and yet he was fear'd

A. D.
1025.

Basilus
dies.

His Cha-
racter.

fear'd and esteem'd by his Subjects, who had conceiv'd a mean Opinion of his Brother Constantine, upon the Account of his dissolute unactive Life. Basilus, notwithstanding his great Age, lov'd still to be at the Head of his Armies in Action; and being inform'd that the Saracens in Sicily committed great Insolencies upon the Subjects of the Empire, and infested the Sea Coasts, he rais'd a powerful Army with an intent to restrain and chastise 'em. Accordingly he sent a strong Body of his Forces before, under the Conduct of Orestes his Favourite Eunuch, and intended to follow in Person shortly after, but was prevented by Death in the Month of December, A. D. 1025, after he had liv'd seventy Years, and reign'd fifty.

This Emperor's Reign was long, and full of Action, throughout which he chose rather to be fear'd than belov'd by his Subjects. He affected a great Command over his Passions, which however very often got the Ascendant over him upon the smallest Provocations. Tho' from his Youth he was much addicted to the Wars, yet he took little or no care to ingratiate himself with the Soldiers, who notwithstanding respected his Person, and obey'd him chearfully. He had little or no Esteem for Learning, or learned Men, tho' in other respects he frequently appear'd desirous of Fame, and was often guilty of Ostentation. He took a great Delight in keeping his Coffers full, and had collected vast quantities of Pearls, and rich Jewels, with which he never appear'd but upon great Festivals, and when he gave Audience to Foreign Ambassadors. However he was highly esteem'd by the generality of his Subjects for his diligent Application to publick Affairs, and his fortunate Success in all his Undertakings. 'Tis much to his Reputation, that he at length effected an absolute Conquest over the Bulgarians, which had for a long time been in vain attempted by so many of his Predecessors. Basilus dy'd in the second Year of Con-

rade

made the First Emperor of Germany, and of John the Nineteenth Pope of Rome, and sixth of Ferdinand the First King of Castile.

---

C H A P. III.

From the Death of Basilus to the Reign of Alexius Comnanus, in whose Time the Western Christians undertook their Expedition into the Holy Land.

Containing the Space of Fifty Six Years.

I. TH O' Constantine had born the Name of Emperor in Conjunction with his Brother, and might be thought, as well from his Age as Experience, to be justly qualify'd for that Supream Dignity, yet in every respect he behav'd himself altogether unworthy of it; and it too visibly appear'd after Basilus his Death, that it was happy for the State he did not die before. For Constantine being a dissolute, vicious Prince in his own Nature, employ'd none about him but Persons as infamous as himself, preferring 'em to the most considerable Employments in the Government. These Men, that they might answer the Ends for which they were advanc'd, oppress'd the Provinces, and burden'd the People, so that the State may be said to suffer more under the short Reign of this Emperor, than it had prosper'd under those of Nicephorus, Zimisces and Basilus, who, had severally contributed so exceedingly to the Strength and Advancement of it. Besides, Constantine appear'd no less zealous in the Oppression and Ruin of good and worthy Men, especially such as he imagin'd had formerly been forward to discover his vicious Practices to his Brother; so that a Day hardly pass'd that was not made infamous by the 1026.

A. D.

Constantine's Management of his Affairs.

Fall

Fall of some Great Man, whose Virtues were his only Crimes. Amongst the rest Nicephorus Comnenus was as remarkable for his Disgrace as he was renown'd for his Virtue. Nicephorus had for some time commanded a Body of the Imperial Forces upon the Borders against the Saracens; and having observ'd that his Soldiers by degrees grew wanton and effeminate, he labour'd to re-establish the ancient Discipline amongst 'em, and after he had, by frequent Exhortations, reminded 'em of their Duty, he bound 'em all, by a voluntary Oath, never to forsake him, but oppose the Enemy to the last extremity. When the Report of this honourable Association was brought to Constantinople, the Emperor's cowardly effeminate Ministers represented the thing to be of so dangerous a Consequence to his Safety, that they easily prevail'd with him to have Nicephorus depriv'd of his Command, and shortly after to have his Eyes pluck'd out. He proceeded with the same Severity and Injustice against Bardas the Son of the late famous Phocas, whose extraordinary Merit had render'd him suspected, or envy'd by the unworthy Emperor; for which reason he suborn'd Witnesses, who accus'd him of Conspiring against Constantine, who gave an open Ear to their Accusations, and punish'd him accordingly. These Proceedings against Men of the greatest Reputation in the Empire rais'd a general Discontent among the People, and that gave a Beginning to several Mutinies and Insurrections, which however were all happily suppress'd, and the Emperor's chief Care was to punish those who had least deserv'd it. For all those of any Power in the State, who were too good to be his Favourites, and dislik'd the Management of Affairs, were by subtle collusive Arguments prov'd guilty, and remov'd to make way for others more agreeable to the present Temper of the Court. These his Proceedings at home expos'd him to the Contempt of the Nations abroad, so that several Irruptions were made into the Territories of the Em-

Empire, but were, with much ado, restrain'd by the great Diligence of those who commanded on the Borders. At length Constantine, being declin'd in Years, and enervated by his sensual Pleasures, fell dangerously ill, and was given over by his Physicians. He had three Daughters by Helena, the Daughter of Alynius the Patrician, but never a Son, so that the whole Court was divided into several Cabals upon Designation of a Successor. Some propos'd Constantinus Delassenus, who at that time commanded the Forces in Armenia; and others labour'd with great Earnestness for Romanus Argyrus, a Man of an ancient Family, and nearly ally'd to the Emperor. It was concluded, that whoever succeeded should marry one of the Emperor's Daughters, which at first seem'd much to oppose those who were for the Promotion of Romanus, who was already marry'd; but they, having the greatest Interest in Constantine, prevail'd with him to send for Romanus, and propose to him either to lose his Eyes, or marry one of the Emperor's Daughters, and be created Cæsar. Romanus continu'd for some time undetermin'd, 'till his Wife, hearing of the Conditions, and fearing lest his Constancy would cost him his Eyes, voluntarily shav'd herself, and turn'd Nun: By this means she made room for Zoe the Emperor's second Daughter, to whom he was shortly after marry'd, and created Cæsar. Upon the third Day after the Nuptials Constantine dy'd, after he had liv'd something more than Seventy Years, and had been Emperor without a Colleague almost three, A. D. 1028.

Romanus
II.

Romanus being thus beyond Expectation rais'd to the Imperial Dignity, at first behav'd himself like an active careful Prince. He releas'd the People of many Taxes, with which several of his Predecessors, especially Constantine, had burden'd 'em, and recommended himself by several Acts of Grace and Royal Favours. His Liberality to the Church was extraordinary, as was likewise his Indulgence to those who had been taken Prisoners

Romanus
his first Actions.

Prisoners in the late Wars, and were detain'd in Captivity ; for he generously releas'd 'em at his own Expence, and gave those who where in Necessity, a comfortable Subsistence at their Return home : During the whole Reign of his Predecessor, the Empire was infested with a most grievous Drought ; but now, as if Divine Providence had been aton'd by these Acts of Charity, the Earth was again refresh'd by seasonable Rains, which produc'd an abundance of all Fruits, especially of Oil.

*The Affairs
in the East.*

But whilst the People at Constantianople were congratulating their new Emperor for his auspicious Reign, the Roman Interest receiv'd a great Blow from the Arms of the Saracens in the East, which was chiefly owing to the Indiscretion of Spondyles, whom Constantine had made Governor of Antioch. The Emperor Nicephorus, as has been observ'd before, very much enlarg'd the Borders of the Empire in Syria and Phœnicia, where he recover'd most of the Cities, and his Successor Zimisces pursu'd the Conquest as far as Damascus. The Beginning of Basilus his Reign was busied in the Civil Wars, and they were succeeded by that with the Bulgarians, in which he was so wholly employ'd, that the Eastern Parts lay neglected, which encourag'd the Saracens to prepare for some Action, tho' they attempted nothing whilst that Emperor liv'd ; but under the dissolute Government of his Successor they openly declar'd themselves, whereupon the chief Cities in the East threw off the Yoke, and asserting their Liberty, massacred all the Soldiers that were Garrison'd among 'em. None appear'd more active in this Revolution, than the Governor or Caliph of Berræa, who by his continu'd Incursions grievously infested Antioch, and the adjacent Country. Spondyles endeavour'd in several Engagements to restrain him, but being constantly worsted by him, he return'd with much Dishonour into the City, where he was over-reach'd by the Subtilty of Asaraptius a Captive Arabian, who, perceiving his Vanity and Indiscretion, undertook to perform mighty

*The Sara-
cens revolt.*

mighty Matters against the Saracens, if he might but be set at Liberty, and particularly show'd Spondyles a Plat of Ground, whereon if he might be permitted to build a Fort, he promis'd to make it eminently serviceable to the Emperor. Spondyles readily believ'd what the Arabian had advanc'd; and having given him his Liberty committed the Building of the Fort to his Care; and when it was finish'd Garrison'd it with a thousand Men under the Command of Asaraptius, who, having thus accomplish'd his Ends, maintain'd a Correspondence with the General of the Saracens, who sent him a Body of Men to whom he surrendr'd the Castle, having first, by their Assistance, put all the Garrison to the Sword.

Hereupon the Emperor, having remov'd Spondyles from his Command, resolv'd upon an Expedition in Person against the Infidels, with a purpose to redeem, if possible, so much Loss and Disgrace, and prosecute the War with Vigour. But before he was advanc'd far on his Way, the Saracens, upon a Report of his mighty Preparations, sent their Messengers with Presents from Berræa to ask Pardon for what was past, and promise to return to their former Obedience, and faithfully pay their usual Tribute for the future. Those of most Experience in the Army advis'd Romanus to accept of their Submission, and proceed no farther, alledging, among other Reasons, that in the Summer time Syria stood much in want of Water; that the Saracens, being accusom'd to it, could endure both Heat and Thirst; but that the Romans, being loaden with their heavy Armour, could support themselves under neither. Romanus had done wisely had he listen'd to these Remonstrances, but being possess'd with a Vanity of the great Honour he should acquire, he reject'd the Messengers with Disdain, and proceeded on in his Expedition. Being enter'd into Syria he detach'd a Party, who were to observe the Motions of the Enemy, and discover whereabouts the Army might most commodiously encamp.

The Emperor's Expedition against 'em.

The Roman Army
destroy'd.

encamp. This Party fell unhappily into an Ambuscade laid designedly for 'em, and were all cut off; with which Success the Saracens were so encourag'd, that they intercepted those of the Romans that were sent out to Forage; and knowing well enough in what their greatest Want consisted, cut off their Supplies of Water, by which means the Army was in time reduc'd to the last Extremity. Constantinus Delasenus, who had lately before been nam'd by some to succeed Constantine the late Emperor, was sent out with a sufficient Power to restrain the Saracens, and cover the Foragers; but he being a Man of a weak cowardly Spirit, ran back in great Confusion at the first Appearance of the Enemy, and struck the rest of the Army with such Consternation, that every Man consider'd how he might best secure himself, and in a Council of War it was resolv'd to decamp, and march to Antioch. Accordingly, as soon as it was Light, the whole Army broke up, and in a weak and sickly Condition began to march. The Arabians, who were very well inform'd of the State they were in, Way-laid 'em; and having drawn 'em into a Place convenient for their purpose, fell with great Violence upon 'em, whilst the Romans, ready to expire without the Assistance of an Enemy, ran shamefully away, and were either taken or kill'd by the Pursuers, or born down and trodden to pieces by their Fellows. The Emperor himself, being courageously defended by his own Guards, escap'd with much difficulty to Antioch, where he found time to reflect on the ill Success of his rash and unfortunate Undertaking. The Enemy got all the Emperor's Baggage, which they might have carry'd off without any Opposition, had they not been over-reach'd by a Stratagem of their own devising. George Maniaces, a Macedonian, was at that time Governor of a small Province, and a Town of no little Importance for the Emperor in those Parts; hither eight hundred of the Saracens, loaden with the rich Plunder of the Emperor's Camp, came, came, after the Pursuit was over, and summon'd Maniaces to surrender, affirming that the Emperor himself was taken, his Army totally defeated, and that it was impossible for him to hold out against the resolute Conquerors; to confirm what they with so much Confidence had alledg'd, they shew'd him their rich Booty, and promis'd him mighty Favours upon Condition he would submit, otherwise that he must expect nothing but an inevitable Destruction. Maniaces, either doubtful of the Truth of what they had affirm'd, or resolv'd to sell the City as dear as he could, seem'd to give Credit to their Information; and having thank'd 'em for their kind Advice, he sent 'em out a great quantity of Provisions, with which he desir'd 'em to refresh themselves that Night, and promis'd to deliver up the Town to 'em as soon as it was Light. The Infidels believ'd all he said, and without any Distrust eat and drunk to that excess, that when Maniaces issu'd out at Midnight, as he had before determin'd, he found 'em drunk and asleep, and kill'd 'em all before they were able to make the least Resistance. After which he took two hundred and eighty Camels loaden with the rich Effects of the late Victory, all which he presented to the Emperor, who by that time was got into Cappadocia, and was so sensible of this reasonable piece of Service, that he made Maniaces Captain or Governor of the Lower Media. After this he return'd very dejected to Constantinople, where, as if his late Success had discourag'd him from any Warlike Attempts for the future, he busied himself in severe Exactions, and oppressing his Subjects at home. He renew'd his Claim to old Debts, thought to have been bury'd in utter Oblivion, and proceeded with so inexorable a Rigour in the Recovery of 'em, that many Persons of noble Families and large Inheritances were driven from their Estates, and constrain'd to beg their Bread from Door to Door. Tho' the Money, rais'd from these Claims, ought to have been lodg'd in the Publick Treasury, where it was due, yet was that and other

L

Romanus
his great Severity.]

other immense Sums, by which the Exchequer was exhausted, consum'd in expensive Buildings, and bestow'd on Monks, on whom he conferr'd whole Cities and Provinces at once; and they being thus enrich'd by the Profuse and Superstitious Emperor, renounc'd the Austerities of Life to which they were by Vow engag'd, and grew Voluptuous, Proud and Effeminate.

These Proceedings of the Emperor rais'd a general Discontent in the People, which gave a Beginning to several Plots and Commotions in the State. Constantine, the late Emperor, left behind him two Daughters beside Zoe the Empress. The eldest of which, call'd Eudocia, having been disfigur'd by the Plague, turn'd Nun; and Theodora, the youngest, refusing to marry Romanus, either because he was too near a Kin to her, as she pretended, or for that his first Wife, of whom mention has been made before, was still alive, afterwards gave Life to several Plots and Undertakings against him, for which Treason Zoe the Empress had her shaven, constrain'd her to turn Nun, and confin'd her to a Monastery, from whence we shall see her remov'd hereafter, to appear cloath'd in the Imperial Purple.

A great
Plague.

At the same time that the Court was distracted by these Fears and Jealousies, so great a Plague and Famine rag'd throughout Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, Armenia, and several other Provinces, that the Inhabitants were forc'd to leave their Dwellings, and disperse themselves into other Parts of the Empire. This was succeeded by a terrible Earthquake, and that by a Comet which pass'd from the North towards the South with a terrible Noise, and seem'd to inflame the whole Horizon. And indeed the Histories of these Times are full of surprizing Prodigies, which for several Years together seem'd to threaten the Empire, and denounce the Wrath of Heav'n against it. Tho' Romanus his Forces prosper'd abroad, and obtain'd several considerable Advantages over the Infidels near Babylon in Egypt, and against the African Saracens, whose Fleet was destroy'd by Nicephorus Carentenus, his Admiral; yet these

Domestick

Domestick Misfortunes made him reflect on his past Actions, and inclin'd him to Works of Mercy and Compassion. He re-edify'd the Hospitals near Constantinople, erected for the Relief of the Poor, and that had been destroy'd by the late Earthquakes, and repairing the Aqueducts, supply'd the City with Water, of which it began to be in great want. The rest of his time, which was not assign'd to these Acts of Charity, was employ'd in his Devotions, and Conversation with religious Persons, whom he carefully reliev'd, protected and encourag'd; so that, in all probability, he would have dy'd universally lamented by his Subjects, whom he now labour'd to reconcile and oblige, had his Empress suffer'd him to live longer. He was sixty Years of Age when he was first marry'd to her, notwithstanding which he flatter'd himself with many Years to come, and the Happiness of Children to succeed him. Accordingly at first he made use of Ointments and other Expedients, that might enable him to meet her with a vigorous Heat, and omitted no Arts to make himself strong, and prepare her for Conception. The Empress, being of a hot and amorous Constitution, made use of Charms and Inchantments to provoke and allure him; but when he found all his Endeavours prov'd ineffectual, he totally declin'd such Conjugal Visits, being by Nature averse, and by Age become incapable of those Carnal Conflicts. The Empress, whilst she had no other Object to provoke her Lust, bore with him patiently; but having at length cast her Eyes on Michael, the Brother of John, an Eunuch in great Authority with the Emperor, an adulterate Heat incens'd her against him, and provok'd her shortly after to remove him out of the Way. The Account we have of this Action shows us how ungovernable Women are in their Lust, when they are abandon'd to it; for tho' Zee hated John to the last degree, yet had she no sooner ascertain'd a Passion for Michael, but she quitted her former Resentments, and frequently entertain'd a familiar, miliar Conversation with him, tho' for no other reason, but that she might have an Opportunity of bringing his Brother, who, through the Eunuch's Interest, was made one of the Bed-Chamber, into the Discourse. John was at first surpriz'd at this unusual Condescension in the Empress; but when he found, from repeated Observations, that his Brother was still the darling Topick of her Conversation, he acquainted him with what he had observ'd, and advis'd him, if ever she apply'd her self familiarly to him, to receive her with the Air of a Lover, and never recede 'till he had won the last Favour from her, which, he thought, might with little or no Difficulty be obtain'd. Michael, thus instructed, found an easie Conquest, and their Amours grew at first the Discourse of the Court, and afterwards of the whole City, the Emperor himself, as it is usual in those Cases, being the last that entertain'd any Suspicion of it. Some say he tax'd Michael with it, who solemnly upon Oath deny'd it; for which Perjury he was said to be struck with a terrible Disease, being seiz'd with a Frenzy, and dreadful Convulsions at his Eyes, which made him pity'd by the Emperor, who suspected him no longer, but thought him a very unfit Person to allure an Empress to his Embraces. Others say Romanus was thoroughly convinc'd of their Intrigues, but knowing from Experience how wantonly the Empress was inclin'd, wink'd at her Practices, lest he should provoke her to be more infamously a Prostitute. However it were, this Impunity cost the aged Emperor his Life; for Zoe, grown impatient of being any longer confin'd in her Amours, which she was forc'd to manage secretly and in fear, resolv'd, by the Death of the Emperor, to make way for a more open and avow'd Enjoyment of 'em, and for that purpose gave him a Poison, which working slowly seiz'd him insensibly, and by degrees destroy'd him. As it began to work his Face swell'd, and was discolour'd; his Hair fell off, and he labour'd under a Difficulty of Respiration. Tho'

A. D.
1034.

*Romanus
poison'd by
the Empress.*

Zoe

Zoe had no reason to distrust the Effects of her Physick, yet was she so impatient, that she order'd her Creatures, appointed to that purpose, to Stifle him on the eleventh, or, as some say, on the fifteenth of April, by holding his Head under Water, as he was refreshing himself in a Bath, out of which he was remov'd to his Bed Speechless, but not quite Dead. Thither the Empress hasten'd with an affected Lamentation to bewail the Loss she had her self procur'd, and left him not 'till she saw him breathe his last, after he had reign'd five Years and six Months, A. D. 1034.

Romanus had in his Youth apply'd himself to Learning, and had a good taste of the old Greek Authors, and some Knowledge of the Civil Laws, and for that reason he appear'd a great Encourager of learned Men after his Advancement to the Imperial Dignity, of which he seem'd more worthy before his Creation, than capable after he was elected. Tho' for his many Acts of Justice and Charity, as well at the Beginning as the latter End of his Reign, he is deservedly to be number'd among those who govern'd well; he might, in all probability, have been happier, as he would undoubtedly have liv'd longer, in a private State; but she, who gave him the Empire, procur'd him likewise his Death, not more to the Detriment of the State than her own Shame and Disgrace.

The Emperor being dead, whilst the Passion of our Saviour, or the Office appointed for Good-Friday, was celebrated in the Church, Alexius the Patriarch, ignorant of what had been transacted at Court, was sent for thither in great haste, as by Command from Romanus, whom, at his coming, he found dead; and being introduc'd to Zoe she commanded him to marry her to Michael. The Patriarch, surpriz'd at the Novelty, as well as Heinousness of the thing, stood silent for some time, and declin'd the Office, 'till John and the Empress presented him with fifty Pounds of Gold, and gave as much more to his Clergy, and so prevail'd upon him to comply. By this means Michael

Michael
the Paphlagonian.
made Em-
peror.

Michael was advanc'd to the Throne, and was Partner with Zoe not only in the Bed, but in the Imperial Power, which Zoe at first thought to reserve entire to her self, and to be absolute in the Empire. Of this John the Eunuch, Michael's Brother, who knew the ambitious, as well as amorous Temper of Zoe, was seasonably aware, and therefore reflecting on Romanus his Fate, he suddenly remov'd all the Women, in whom she had any Confidence, from her; he dismiss'd all the Eunuchs, and substituted his own assur'd Friends, and most intimate Acquaintance in their Places, by which means she was confin'd in a manner as to a Prison, being able to do nothing of the least Moment without his Knowledge and Approbation.

When the Eunuch had thus, as it were, disarm'd her, and prevented her from doing any Mischief at home, he dispatch'd his Letters into the Provinces, by which the Governors were acquainted with the Death of Romanus, and the Succession of Michael, who, he said, was by common Consent marry'd to Zoe the late Emperor's Widow. None of the Great Men seem'd displeas'd at this Alteration, but Constantinus Delassenus, of whom mention has been made already, who being one of the first Quality in the Empire, was highly offended that a Man of Michael's obscure Birth should be preferr'd to others of the highest Rank and Deserts. John, knowing the Interest as well as the Ambition of Delassenus, endeavour'd by all means to gain him, and at length, after much Diffidence on the one side, and Promises, Presents, Oaths, and Affeverations on the other, prevail'd with him to come to Court, where he was very kindly receiv'd at first, but shortly after was banish'd, upon a form'd Accusation, into the Island Prota; from thence he was remov'd to a strong Tower, where he was confin'd 'till after the Banishment of Michael Calaphates, when Zoe the Empress sent for him to Court. At the same time John remov'd and confin'd such others, in whom he thought he could not safely confide;

side ; amongst the rest Constantinus Monomachus, who, when in his turn he came to be Emperor, remember'd in what manner he had proceeded against him. Having thus remov'd those, whom he thought ill affected to his Family, he committed the Government of the Provinces, and the Charge of Civil Affairs to none but Eunuchs. Maniaces, whom the late Emperor had made Governor of Edessa, was remov'd to the Upper Media. lest continuing long in one Place, his Interest might in time grow so strong as to render him formidable to the Emperor. Nicetas, the Emperor's Brother, was made Governor of Antioch, where dying shortly after, he was succeeded by his other Brother Constantine, enrich'd with the Estates of three of the most wealthy Men in Asia, who had been banish'd upon a pretence of holding a Treasonable Correspondence with Delassenus. For all this while the supream Power rested in John, tho' the Name of Emperor was reserv'd to Michael, who, besides the ill Condition of his Body, began to be distemper'd in his Mind, and conscious of the great Sin he had committed in the Murther of Romanus, he apply'd himself wholly to his Devotions, hoping, by Acts of Piety and Liberality to the Poor, to expiate his great Offence ; tho', as the Writers of those Times observe, all he did upon that Account could profit him little or nothing, since he still lay in the Arms of the Adulterers, and enjoy'd the Price of Murder and Treason. When John observ'd the dangerous Condition of his Brother's Health, he concluded, if he dy'd, the Empress, upon the Recovery of her Authority, would gratifie her Revenge with the Ruin of him and all his Family, if some Expedient was not found out to prevent it. At his Instigation therefore the Emperor promoted Michael, furnam'd Calaphates, his Sister's Son, to the Dignity of Cæsar, and banish'd all the Brothers and Relations of Delassenus, so jealous was John grown of that Man.

John the Eunuch, Brother to the Emperor, governs all.

All this while Zoe the Empress was highly provok'd at the Restraint put upon her, and looking on John as

A. D.
1036.

A Design of
the Sara-cens upon Edeffa prevented.

no other than her Goaler, endeavour'd to get rid of him by Poison, but the Design was discover'd before it could be executed, and serv'd only to admonish John to stand more upon his Guard for the future. This happen'd in the third Year of this Emperor's Reign, which was remarkable for a Truce of thirty Years concluded betwixt him and the Egyptian Saracens, whose Caliph being lately dead, his Widow is said to have embrac'd Christianity, together with her Son, and to have offer'd Peace to the Romans. The Year following was no less remarkable for three several Earthquakes, which did great Mischief in several Parts of the Empire; and for the Attempt of the Saracens upon the City of Edeffa, which narrowly escap'd falling into their Hands. Twelve of the Principal Men of their Nation came to the Governor of that City with five hundred Horse, and as many Camels, all loaden with heavy Boxes: They pretended the Boxes contain'd Presents, which they were carrying to the Emperor, and desir'd they might be admitted into the Town. The Governor entertain'd the twelve Persons with great Civility at a Feast, but, knowing the deceitful Practices of that Nation, refus'd to receive the Horsemen and Camels into the City, which was preserv'd by this Diffidence; for there was no less than twelve thousand arm'd Men conceal'd in those Boxes, who were order'd in the dead of Night to get into the Castle, and, having kill'd the Sentinels, they were to secure both that and the Town. The Design being discover'd to the Governor by a poor Armenian, he left the Feast on a sudden, and taking a sufficient Force with him, seiz'd on the Saracens as they lay without the Town, and kill'd every one of 'em upon the Spot: After which he return'd to his Guests, who met with much the same Treatment from him, for he spar'd but one, whom having depriv'd of his Hand, Ears, and Nose, he sent him home in that Condition to give his Countrymen an Account of their Success. All this while Zoe enjoy'd small Fruits of

of her late unnatural Treason and Adultery ; for besides that John observ'd her with a wary Eye, and restrain'd the natural Impetuosity of her Spirit ; the Emperor's Distemper had by this time prevail'd so much upon him, that he was not only grown infirm, and incapable of concurring with her wanton Desires, but so alter'd in his Person, which was at first exceeding beautiful, that he was now deform'd and loathsome. This serv'd only to augment the great Authority of John, Zoe's most implacable Adversary ; for whilst the Emperor, who besides his old Distemper was now grievously afflicted with a Dropsie, abandon'd himself to Acts of Penitence and Devotion, John govern'd the Empire with an unlimited Power, which he made use of to the Oppression and Impoverishment of the People, and the Aggrandizing his own Family. And as if these Calamities were not sufficient to humble and correct a guilty People, terrible Earthquakes and destructive Tempests seem'd to shake the Foundations of the Earth, which, tho' horrible and amazing in themselves, seem'd to bring this Comfort with them, that they denounc'd the approaching Fall of the Tyrants. These domestick Calamities were followed by others from abroad, which were like to have prov'd fatal to the Empire ; for the Bulgarians revolted the very same Year, and threw off their Allegiance. A Citizen of Constantinople had in his Service a Bulgarian, call'd Deleanus, or Dolianus, who running from his Master upon some Provocations given him, escap'd into Bulgaria, where he confidently affirm'd he was the Son of Gabriel, and Grandson to Samuel, late King of that Country ; being a Man of a ready Wit and personable Appearance, the giddy Bulgarians, grown weary of the Yoke to which they had but lately submitted, receiv'd him with joyful Acclamations, and proclaim'd him King, cruelly murdering all the Romans that had the Misfortune to fall into their Hands. This Insurrection was follow'd by a Revolt of the Inhabitants of Dyrrachium in Albania, occasion'd by an an unseasonable Quarrel betwixt Michael Dermocaitas, a Tribune in the Army, and Basilus Synademus, Governor of that City. For as he was marching out against the Bulgarians with the Forces garrison'd in that Place, the Contention was carry'd so high between 'em, that the Tribune accus'd Synademus of Treason at Court; whereupon he was seiz'd by Order from the Emperor, and sent Prisoner to Thessalonica, and the Accuser was preferr'd to the Government of Dyrrachium in his stead; in which he behav'd himself with so much Insolence, and oppress'd the Inhabitants with such cruel Exactions, that they rose up against him, and forc'd him out of the Town. When this was done, and they began to consider how the Matter would be resent'd by the Emperor, despairing of Pardon they openly revolted, and chose Teichomere, a Soldier of great Reputation among them, for their King.

The Bulgarians revolt, and proclaim Dolianus King ;

and the Inhabitants of Dyrrachi-
um make choice of Teicho-mere for their King.

This unexpected Election at first very much surpriz'd Deleanus and his Adherents, for there were now two great Factions in Bulgaria, and neither of 'em very likely to attain their Ends, but rather to effect each other's Ruin. Of this Deleanus was very sensible, and therefore endeavour'd to obtain that by Artifice, which Fortune seem'd to deny to more open Attempts. Accordingly he sent Teichomere a very obliging Letter, in which he told him how well pleas'd he should be to have him for his Colleague, and earnestly invited him to come and share the Sovereignty with him. Teichomere, who had more of the Soldier than Statesman, believ'd him sincere in his Professions, and went without any distrust and join'd with him. When Deleanus had thus got him, as he thought, into his Power, he watch'd his Opportunity, and in a form'd Speech, which he made to the Soldiers, he told 'em, He was of Opinion Bulgaria would not admit of two Kings together, and that therefore they ought either to confirm his Election, who was descended from Samuel, and remove Teichomere, or if they thought him most worthy

worthy then to establish him. This Speech at first created a great Contest in the Army, by whom Teichomere was entirely belov'd; but at length Deleanus his Faction prevail'd, not only in the Choice of him for their King, but the Stoning of the unhappy Teichomere; by whose Death Deleanus being become absolute without a Rival, he march'd with his Army towards Thessalonica, where he heard the Emperor lay, who, upon the first Report of Deleanus his Approach, fled in a precipitate manner to Constantinople, leaving all his Baggage and Treasure behind him to the care of Manuel Ibatza, one of his Domesticks, who having Orders to follow with it after him, betray'd his Trust, and carry'd it over to Deleanus, whose Party was strengthen'd by some new Accession almost every Day; so that in a short Time he took not only Dyrrachium, and the Territories adjoining to it, but almost the whole Province of Nicopolis, whilst John the Eunuch, instead of preventing the ill Consequences of such a Revolution, and providing Forces to oppose and suppress the Usurper, grew more licentious in his Exactions, and disgusted most of those who had the Power or Will to serve the Emperor. Among these was Alusianus, the Son of Aaron, and Brother to John, the last King of Bulgaria, who, when that Country submitted to Basilus, was kindly receiv'd by the Emperor, and gratify'd with the Dignity of a Patrician; but now, being accus'd of some unjust Proceedings, he was forbidden the Court till his Cause could be brought to an Hearing, and oblig'd to pay a great Sum of Gold to John, who moreover forc'd a beautiful Woman from him, whom he had kept secretly in the Country, and for whom he had a very extraordinary Passion, which incens'd him more than all the rest; wherefore cloathing himself in an Armenian Habit he got undiscover'd into Bulgaria, where the generality of the People receiv'd him with great Demonstrations of Joy, and Deleanus caress'd him outwardly with much Tenderness,

ness, but was inwardly offended at the Presence of one, who was a real Descendant of that Family of which he pretended himself a Member. Observing how entirely the Soldiers appear'd affected to him, and how much his Greatness was like to be eclips'd, he thought it the wisest way to make a voluntary Offer, and share that Dominion with him, to which he appear'd to have the sole Right. Alusianus being therefore receiv'd as his Collegue, was instantly sent at the Head of forty thousand Men to besiege Thessalonica, which however Constantine the Patrician, and Kinsman to the Emperor, defended with so much Conduct and Resolution, that he was in the end forc'd to raise the Siege, and leave fifteen thousand of his Men dead behind him.

This Defeat ripen'd the Jealousies and Distaste that had been already conceiv'd between the two Competitors, for Deleanus would ascribe the late Overthrow to nothing but Treachery, and Alusianus grew more peevish and untractable from the sense of his Disgrace, so that each in private meditated nothing but the Destruction of the other; and Alusianus having invited his Collegue to an Entertainment, first made him drunk, and then pluck'd out his Eyes; immediately after which, being doubtful of his own Interest, and the fickle Humour of the Bulgarians, he sent to Michael, promising to submit and return to his Obedience, upon Condition of a Pardon, and such a Reward as his Service might be thought to deserve, which was readily granted him by the Emperor, who had resolv'd in Person to make an Expedition into Bulgaria, affirming, It was a Shame for him to suffer any Part of the Empire to be torn from it, who during his whole Reign had added nothing to it: But his Dropsie had now so far prevail'd upon him, that his Friends advis'd him to desist from it, and trust the Expedition to the Management of some other, which however serv'd only to quicken him, and make him more earnest in his Preparations; so that being enter'd into the Country, the Bulgarians, who were now without a Head to advise and command 'em, dispers'd themselves, and in a very short time return'd to their Obedience, after which the Emperor return'd in Triumph to Constantinople; where perceiving by the Prevalence of his Disease, that his Death approach'd, he divested himself of the Imperial Purple, cast off all Cares of State, and, being shaven for a Monk, enter'd into a Monastery of his own Building, where he gave himself wholly up to Religious Exercises and Acts of Penitence, in which he appear'd very sincere, devoutly lamenting his past Sins, especially the Murder of Romanus. He continu'd in this Temper of Mind 'till Death put an end to his Devotions on the tenth Day of December, after he had reign'd seven Years and eight Months, A. D. 1041.
to

Michael
quits the Empire,
and turns Monk;

and dies.

As the Murder of Romanus ought to be charg'd upon John, rather than on Michael, who appears to have been naturally a religious and conscientious Man, so must the Severities, with which his Reign is justly tax'd, be ascrib'd to the same Instrument. It may properly be call'd the Reign of Eunuchs, since few or none were entrusted with the Management of Affairs but they; and certainly no Prince, who of himself had a tender regard to the Welfare of his Subjects, was ever serv'd with worse Ministers. As he was notorious for his great Sins of Adultery and Treason, so was he in as high a degree commendable for his exemplary Repentance, and is an Instance to us, that the greatest Enjoyments upon Earth cannot soften the Stings of a guilty Conscience.

Michael being dead the Empire devolv'd upon Zoe, who, finding the weight of Affairs too heavy for her to support without an Assistant, was easily persuaded to adorn Michael Calaphates, the late Emperor's Nephew, with the Imperial Purple. Michael had been created Cæsar by his Uncle, as has been before observ'd; and some affirm, that the Empress Zoe adopted him at the same time for her Son. At the time when tes.

Michael Calapha-

A. D.

1041.

Cala-phates
made Em-
peror,

when the late Emperor withdrew into the Monastery he was absent, having receiv'd Orders from his Uncle, who seem'd to repent of what he had done in his Behalf, not to come near the Court, or the Imperial City, without leave first obtain'd for that purpose. But Michael having resign'd the Purple, his Brothers sent immediately for the Nephew to return ; and he, by an artful Management, so far insinuated himself into Zoe's good Opinion, that she listen'd to the Advice of those who persuaded her to make him Emperor ; tho' for her own Security she first remov'd John and his Brother, together with such others as had appear'd the most active against her in the late Reign.

The World expected mighty Advantages from this Advancement of Michael ; for he had the Reputation of an active industrious Man, but he quickly deceiv'd the Hopes his Subjects had conceiv'd of him, and prov'd a cruel, ungrateful, and degenerate Prince. His first Proceedings were against those of his own Family ; for tho' at first he seem'd to listen to the Advice of his Uncle John, notwithstanding he had been remov'd by Zoe, yet in the end, after he had affronted him several times in a very high manner, he sent him into Banishment ; he acted with the same Severity against his other Relations, causing both Husbands and Fathers to be made Eunuchs, without any Regard had to their Age or Circumstances. Only his Uncle Constantine he recall'd with Zoe's leave, and communicated all his Councils to him, and was directed by him. This unnatural Behaviour to his own Family could be exceeded by nothing but his Ingratitude to Zoe, whom he reduc'd to a private State, pretending she was guilty of Witchcraft and Sorcery, and that she had attempted to take away his Life.

who depo-
ses Zoe ;

Tho' he thought, by these plausible Suggestions, to satisfy the Minds of the People, yet they having a great Veneration for Zoe, upon the Account of her high high Birth, and judging the Empire justly descended to her by Hereditary Right, were generally discontented; and observing Michael wallow'd in his sensual Pleasures, without any regard to the high Dignity he bore, they broke out into a general Sedition, and resolv'd every Man to venture his Life in the Vindication of her, who they thought was us'd unworthily. Michael, the same time that he remov'd Zoe, threaten'd and is him- self depos'd. to depose Alexius the Patriarch, as consenting to her Designs, who, as soon as he was inform'd of it, fled into the Great Church, whither all the old Eunuchs, and other Officers that had serv'd under Basilus and Constantine repair'd, where, with an unanimous Consent, they sent for Theodora out of the Monastery, where she had been confin'd, and in the Church saluted her Empress, together with her Sister Zoe; whilst Michael, observing how resolutely the People were bent against him, withdrew with his Brother into a Monastery, where they both took the Religious Habit, thinking thereby to evade the Fury of the enrag'd Multitude, who notwithstanding were all resolv'd upon their Deaths; but the great Dispute amongst 'em was what manner of Deaths they should die. Whilst they were busied in this Dispute, Zoe, forgetting with how much Indignity she had been us'd by the Family, and perhaps a little compassionate to a Creature of her own raising, mov'd for their Lives; but Theodora, resenting her long Imprisonment, and eager to express her Anger against the first Object that presented it self, at first adher'd to those who were for nailing 'em to a Pole; and when she found that Point could not be carry'd, she mov'd that their Eyes might be pluck'd out, to which at length all agreed, and Orders were given to Capanares, Prefect of the City, to see it executed. When the unhappy Princes heard of the Messengers Approach, and to what purpose they were sent, they withdrew into the most secret Parts of the Church, dedicated to the Memory of St. John the Baptist, from whence however the implacable Multitude dragg'd dragg'd 'em, and pull'd their Eyes out in the Forum. Constantine behav'd himself with a very even Temper, but Michael, with great Reluctancy and Lamentation, desir'd his Uncle, who had been the Author of all those Evils of which they complain'd, might first be punish'd for 'em, which was granted accordingly. After this Michael was banish'd with all his Relations, after a tumultuary Reign of something more than four Months.

Constantinus Monomachus.

Zoe, being thus reinstated in her Authority, remov'd all such as had been in greatest Trust with the late Tyrants, and preferr'd those who had serv'd her Father and her Uncle, or been disgrac'd by John during his Administration, amongst whom was John Maniaces, of whom mention has been made before, who had been clapp'd up in Prison during the late Administration, but was now made General of the Western Forces. Tho' Matters had herein been manag'd with the general Approbation of all, yet the State seem'd not perfectly settled in the Opinion of the People, 'till they had an Emperor to obey, who being lawfully marry'd to Zoe might put an end to all Competition, and have a Right to command over 'em. Zoe was as willing to marry as the People were to see her marry'd, so that after a Trial of some others, who did not appear fit for her purpose, she made choice of Constantinus Monomachus, a Person of noble Extraction and beautiful Aspect. He had been banish'd during the Reign of Michael into the Island of Lesbos, either at the Instigation of John the Eunuch, or for that the Emperor mistrusted there was too great an Intimacy between him and the Empress; from Lesbos John afterwards order'd him to be remov'd to Metylene, and from thence the Empress now sent for him, and first marry'd, and then had him crown'd Emperor by the Hands of the Patriarch. Monomachus, as soon as he was advanc'd to the Imperial Dignity, endeavour'd by all means to oblige his Subjects, and ingratiate himself with the two Empresses. John the Eunuch he first confin'd confin'd to Lesbos, and shortly after, either at the Instigation of Theodora the Empress, or out of Resentment for his own Confinement, he pluck'd out his Eyes, in a short time after which John dy'd.

Tho' Constantine had immediately upon his Advancement done all that he thought requisite for the Security of the State, and to render himself acceptable to his People, yet George Maniaces, at the beginning of his Reign, rais'd such a powerful Interest against him, as seem'd at first to threaten him with unavoidable Destruction. Constantine had had a Mistress, who had been a faithful Companion to him in all his Misfortunes, burning with an uncommon Passion towards him, and supplying him very liberally during his Exile; for being descended from the great Sclerus she was Mistress of a plentiful Fortune. The Emperor, who had been thus oblig'd by her, lov'd her with an equal Passion, and had not a more absolute Command over his Subjects, than she had over his Affections. She had a Brother whose Estate join'd to that of Maniaces, to whom he bore a Mortal Hatred, and who at that time was employ'd in the Emperor's Affairs in Italy, where he signaliz'd himself by his many Services. During his Absence Sclerus, depending upon the great Interest his Sister had in the Emperor, presum'd not only to injure his Estate, but lay with his Wife; and that he might be sure to give Maniaces a sufficient Provocation, got him to be remov'd from his Command, and to have it conferr'd upon a Fellow altogether unworthy so great a Trust. Maniaces was so enrag'd at these Proceedings, that having first secur'd the Forces under his Command to declare for him, and kill'd him who was design'd for his Successor, he assum'd the Imperial Ornaments, and was saluted Emperor. After which he pass'd over with his Army into Bulgaria, where he was join'd by great Multitudes of the Malecontents in that Country.

Maniaces
usurps.

Monomachus, as soon as he was inform'd of this Rebellion, sent him Letters, in which he offer'd him and his Followers an Indemnity and Pardon for what was past, together with several considerable Rewards, provided they would lay down their Arms, and return to their Obedience. But when he found that Maniaces, who was animated more by the Spirit of Revenge than Ambition, would listen to no Terms, but continu'd fix'd in his Resolution, he sent Stephen Sebastophorus at the Head of a very powerful Army against him, which was defeated, and totally broken at the first Engagement; whereupon Maniaces was universally acknowledg'd Emperor in the Field, and had, in all probability, given Monomachus a great deal of Trouble, had he not fallen suddenly dead from his Horse, having receiv'd a Mortal Wound in his Breast from some unknown Hand. The Death of Maniaces put an end to the Rebellion, and all they of his Followers, who had been the most forward in it, were now the first that threw down their Arms, and return'd to their Obedience. They revil'd Maniaces as a Traitor, and having cut off his Head presented it to Stephen the Emperor's General, who, tho' he had receiv'd a Defeat, yet had the Honour of a Triumph granted him at his Return to Constantinople.

The Troubles that this Civil War created were hardly compos'd, before the Russians, who had for several Years together maintain'd a peaceable Correspondence with the Emperor, broke the League, and threaten'd the City of Constantinople it self. But the Emperor, having first, by repeated Messengers, offer'd 'em fair Conditions of Peace, which they arrogantly rejected, mann'd a strong Fleet out against 'em, and fought 'em in the Straits about Pharos, where he obtain'd a compleat Victory over 'em, and in the End forc'd 'em to renew the Truce they had so injuriously broken.

Monomachus after this turn'd his Arms into the East, where he recover'd several Cities to the Empire, that
the

The Russians overthrown.

the Connivance or Weakness of his Predecessors had suffer'd to be torn from it ; and was pursuing the War with much Application and Success, when Leo Tornicius, who had been formerly Governor of Iberia, and was nearly related to the Emperor, escap'd out of a Monastery to which he had been confin'd, and assum'd the Imperial Purple. Leo was a Man of excellent Parts, and a very beautiful Aspect, which gain'd him, the Love of all those who convers'd with him, especially of the Macedonians, among whom he had formerly resided ; and there having been a Prophecy publish'd abroad, which promis'd he in time should be Emperor, the Expectations of most Men hung upon him. This made the Emperor view him with a jealous Eye, and when some People had undertaken to accuse him for some unwarrantable Proceedings in his Government of Iberia, Monomachus embrac'd the Opportunity ; and having divested him of his Command, had him shav'd, and constrain'd him to turn Monk. Notwithstanding which a Party of Macedonians took him one Night out of the Monastery, and conducted him to Adrianople, where, when by an unanimous Acclamation he had been saluted Emperor, he prepar'd to make good his Title, and march'd at the Head of a numerous Party towards Constantinople it self. Monomachus had lately, by some unpopular Act, very much disgusted the People, and Leo knew he was not very acceptable to the Soldiers, so that he thought he had great reason to hope the Citizens would open the Gates at his first Appearance, and receive him ; but, contrary to his Expectation, he was so vigorously oppos'd, that he ran a great hazard of his Life, and found that several of his Accomplices fell off from him, and made their Peace with the Emperor ; wherefore fearing lest some of 'em might deliver him up into his Hands, he rais'd the Siege, and retreated to Arcadiopolis, where for some time he defended himself against the Forces the Emperor had sent to reduce him, but was at length taken, and

Leo Tornicius usurps,

and is suppress'd.

sent bound to Monomachus, who commanded his Eyes to be pluck'd out, and after that banish'd him.

A. D.
1048.

This Insurrection being so happily suppress'd almost in its Birth, a more fatal Storm began at that time to threaten the Empire, which in the end fell with an invincible Violence upon it, and crush'd it to pieces. For the Turks, who had lately settled themselves in Persia, where Tangrolipix their Captain was declar'd Sultan, began now to turn their Arms against the Empire. After the Saracens had by a wonderful Progress not only overturn'd the Persian Empire, but had subdu'd Media, Babylon, Assyria, Egypt, Africk, and a considerable Part of Europe it self; this vast Empire was divided into several Parts, which were all govern'd by their respective Sultans or Commanders, who by degrees fell out among themselves, and warr'd one with another. About the Year 1030 Mahomet, the Son of Imbrael, was Sultan of Persia; and he finding Pisafiris, the Sultan of Babylon, against whom he had declar'd War, too strong for him, requir'd the Assistance of the Turks, who were then settled in Armenia Major, into which they had pierc'd thro' the Caspian Straits in the Year 844, where they liv'd a poor and contemptible Nation, 'till these Wars in Persia gave 'em an Opportunity of aggrandizing their Nation. For three thousand of these Turks being thus call'd in by Mahomet, went to his Assistance under the Conduct of Tangrolipix, a Man descended from one of the chief Families among 'em. Mahomet, being thus strengthen'd by these Auxiliary Supplies, obtain'd an easie Conquest over the Babylonians; but when the Turks, who had now done the Business for which they came, requir'd their Wages, and leave to return home, he having a Mind to employ 'em longer against the Indians, with whom he was likewise at War, refus'd to let 'em go, and threaten'd to punish 'em if they insisted upon it. The Turks, being justly provok'd at this Usage, revolted from him, and withdrew into the Wilderness of Carbonitis, where several

The Turks
conquer
Persia.

dis-

discontented Persians united themselves to 'em. Mahomet immediately sent an Army of twenty thousand Men against 'em, which Tangrolipix defeated; and having taken their Camp found many Chariots and Horses, and good store of Money in it, with which he was enabled to pursue the War, and encourage such as would declare for him; by which means his Army was in a short time encreas'd to fifty thousand Men.

Mahomet was so enrag'd at the Defeat of his Forces, that he put out the Eyes of those that commanded 'em, and threaten'd the Soldiers that escap'd to cloath 'em like Women, and ignominiously to expose 'em. At the same time he rais'd a very numerous Army, with which he encounter'd Tangrolipix near Ispahan, but fell off his Horse as he was riding about to animate his Soldiers, and broke his Neck; whereupon both Armies, with a joint Consent, declar'd Tangrolipix King of Persia, and of all the late Sultan's Dominions.

Of which Tangrolipix is de-clar'd Sultan;

Tangrolipix, being thus promoted, open'd the Passage for the rest of his Countrymen, who in prodigious Multitudes flock'd over the Araxes, a River that divided Persia from Armenia, over which was a large Bridge defended by a Fort, which was now remov'd by Tangrolipix, that they might pass over with greater Security. After this he began to enlarge his Dominions, and having slain Pisafiris, the Caliph of Babylon, he sent his Nephew Cutlu-Moses, or Cuthimuses, against the Arabians, by whom he was overthrown, and in his Flight desir'd Stephen, the Emperor's Governor in Media, to grant him a Passage through that Country, which he indiscreetly deny'd, tho' he was in no Condition to oppose him should he force his Way through, which he presently after did; and having taken Stephen Prisoner he sold him for a Slave. Returning to the Sultan he endeavour'd to excuse the Blow he had receiv'd from the Arabians; and that he might make it appear that his Expedition was not altogether fruitless, he acquainted him with the Discoveries he had made in Media, the Fertility of the Country, and how easily it might be conquer'd, it being inhabited by none but Women, for such he thought those with whom he lately fought.

Tho' Tangrolipix was too much incens'd against him for the Loss he had sustain'd in Arabia, to give any open Credit to his Information, yet after he had been defeated himself in a second Engagement with the Arabians, he began to reflect on what his Nephew had told him; and sent Afan, his Brother's Son, with an Army of about twenty thousand Men to conquer Media, which Afan enter'd, and miserably destroy'd, sparing neither Age nor Sex, but suffer'd himself at last to be over-reach'd by the Roman Generals, who lay in Ambush for him, and cut him and the greatest part of the Army in pieces, whilst they were busie in plundering the Camp, which the Romans had quitted on purpose to ensnare 'em.

who invades Media.

Tangrolipix, rather enrag'd than discourag'd at this Misfortune, rais'd an Army of near one hundred thousand Men, which he committed to the Conduct of Abram Alim, his half Brother; they who commanded for the Emperor in Media, thought it adviseable not to run the hazard of a Battel against such a Multitude, but rather to fortifie such Places as seem'd the fittest to be maintain'd, and secure their best Effects within the Walls, 'till they had sent to the Emperor for more Forces, and were able upon more equal Terms to offer the Enemy Battel. In the mean time the Turks ravag'd the Country without any Opposition, and laying Siege to Artze, an open Town, inhabited by great Numbers of Merchants and Tradesmen, and upon that Account esteem'd the wealthiest of any in those Parts; they met with so great an Opposition from the Inhabitants, who for some time made good their want of Walls by their great Numbers and extraordinary Courage, that the Turks, who did not expect to meet with so great a Resistance from a Village, the Wealth of which they vehemently thirsted after, resolv'd to destroy

destroy what they could not get, and so set it on Fire, and forc'd out the Inhabitants, of whom one hundred and fifty thousand are said to have perish'd, partly by the Sword, and partly by the Fire, into which many are reported voluntarily to have cast themselves. The Turks found among the Ruins much Silver, and other things of great Value that were not Combustible. After this they rov'd up and down the Country without observing any Order, in which Condition two of the Roman Generals, whom the Emperor had lately strengthen'd with fresh Supplies, thought it adviseable to fall upon 'em, but were therein oppos'd by Liparites, Prince or Governor of part of Iberia, who commanded likewise for Monomachus; the Reason he would have declin'd fighting was, because it was on Saturday, which he reckon'd amongst the unlucky Days. But Abram, the General of the Turks, and half Brother to Tangrolipix, being inform'd by his Scouts in what Condition the Enemy lay, and understanding the Difference there was between their Generals, march'd up in a regular Order, and offer'd 'em Battel, of which they were in a manner oblig'd to accept, and so prepar'd to receive 'em. The Fight was obstinate on both sides, but at length the Fortune of the Day fell to the Romans; who however having lost Liparites, who engaging too far in the Heat of the Action, and enrag'd for the Loss of a Kinsman slain by the Turks, was taken Prisoner, thought not fit to pursue the Victory, but retir'd; and Abram on the other side, being very proud of his Prisoner, sent him away to the Sultan, who seem'd outwardly pleas'd at his Brother's good Fortune, but was inwardly jealous of his Success, for which reason he shortly after forc'd him to rebel against him; and having overthrown him in a Battel, took him Prisoner, and put him to Death.

A. D.
1049.

The Romans defeat the Turks,

who take Liparites Prisoner;

In the mean time the Emperor, who was highly concern'd at the Captivity of Liparites, sent an Ambassador with rich Presents to Tangrolipix, on purpose

Constantinus Arianites, with Orders to join Michael and Kegenes, and oppose the Bulgarians; yet, in all probability, their Numbers had prevail'd, had not the Scythians drunk too immoderately of Wine, and other Liquors of which they had never tasted before, which threw 'em into Distempers that swept off great Multitudes every Day. Of which when Kegenes, who very well knew the Temper of his Countrymen, was inform'd, he advis'd the Romans to fall suddenly upon 'em; which was done with so much Resolution, that the Barbarians weaken'd by Sicknes, and terrify'd at so sudden an Onset, threw down their Arms, and cry'd for Quarter; which was allow'd to all but such as fell into Kegenes his Hands, who, like a true Renegade, kill'd all those who were not able to buy their Lives with a vast Sum of Money. The rest were by Basilus, the Governor of Bulgaria, disarm'd and dispers'd through the Plains of Sardica, Naisus, and Eutzapelus; only Tyrach, and one hundred and forty of the most noble among 'em were sent to Constantinople, where they were kindly receiv'd by Monomachus; who, having first persuaded 'em to embrace the Christian Religion, conferr'd such Honours and Wealth upon 'em, as rais'd 'em to an higher degree of Happiness than they had ever tasted before.

Thus for the present was an End put to this War, which notwithstanding broke out shortly after with more Fury than ever; for when Tangrolipix, offended at the Reception of his Ambassador, had gather'd all his Forces together out of Persia, Arabia, and other Provinces, in order to renew the War; Monomachus, besides his other Preparations, arm'd fifteen thousand of these Scythians, and sent four of those, who resided at Constantinople, to command 'em and conduct 'em into Iberia. These, being thus arm'd, march'd chearfully as far as Melitene, the Metropolis of Armenia Minor; but as they proceeded on farther they began to reflect on the Service that was impos'd upon 'em, and by the Advice of Catalunes, one of their Officers,

Officers, they resolv'd to return back to their Country-men; where, when they were arriv'd, they arm'd their Companions, and removing to the Plains lying upon the Ister, from thence they made Incursions into Thrace and Macedonia, and grievously molested the Subjects of the Empire. Hereupon the Emperor sent for Kegenes to consult with him, what Methods were the most proper to suppress 'em. Kegenes came at the Head of a strong Party, and encamp'd in a Plain near the Imperial City, where three of his Country-men endeavour'd to Assassinate him one Night as he lay in his Tent, but his Guards coming timely to his Assistance, they had only time to give him a slight Wound; for as they were preparing to second their Blow they were seiz'd, and, without suffering themselves to be examin'd upon the Spot, appeal'd to the Emperor. Hereupon Kegenes was conducted in a Chariot into the City, and the three Assassines were led bound after him. When he was brought before the Emperor, Monomachus ask'd Balizar, the Son of Kegenes, why they had not put the Villains immediately to Death; and he replying, That it was because they had appeal'd to him; the jealous Emperor suspected some Treachery, and sent immediately for the Men, who being ask'd for what reason they attempted to murder their Leader, they affirm'd with much Assurance, That they undertook it for his Sake, and the Safety of the City; which Kegenes had a Design to have enter'd early the next Morning, and having plunder'd it, to have return'd with the rich Booty into his own Country.

The Scythian War renew'd.

The Emperor, without any farther Inquisition, gave Credit to this improbable and ill-grounded Accusation; wherefore, having first order'd those Villains to be set at Liberty, he commanded Kegenes to be remov'd to Court, under a Pretence of having his Wound cur'd with greater Care, and himself more diligently attended; there he kept him immur'd close up, and separated his Sons one from the other. At the

the same time he shew'd great Kindness to his Men, giving 'em large Allowances of Provision, but design'd by degrees to disarm 'em, and imprison those whom he apprehended to be the most dangerous among 'em. Tho' this Design was manag'd with the greatest Secrecy, yet the Scythians, who seem'd outwardly well pleas'd with their Usage, and promis'd an entire Submission and Obedience, had Intimation of the Thing, and broke up by Night from their Camp, and by long Marches got the third Day over the Mountain Hæmus, and join'd with their Countrymen, who being thus united, and having plenty of Arms among them, came almost as far as the City of Adrianople, and wasted all the Country round about. Constantinus Areianites, the General of the Western Forces, was then in that City; and having engag'd 'em near a Fort call'd Dampolis was defeated, and forc'd to retire with a considerable Loss. Whereupon the Emperor was advis'd to send Tyrach, and the other Scythians residing at Constantinople, to pacifie and compose their Nation. These Persons having been oblig'd by rich Presents from Monomachus, engag'd themselves by Oath to the Performance of it; but being dismiss'd, and having join'd the rest of their Countrymen, they were so far from accomplishing what they had so solemnly undertaken, that they conspir'd with 'em, and discover'd all the Designs that were forming against 'em. Monomachus, as soon as he was inform'd of this Defection, sent for all the Eastern Forces to join the rest, and march against the Barbarians; who, notwithstanding the whole Strength of the Empire seem'd engag'd against 'em, had the Advantage in several Engagements, and obtain'd some considerable Victories, which was chiefly to be attributed to the Rashness, Ignorance, and Indiscretion of the Generals that were sent against 'em. This Success made 'em more Daring, Cruel, and Outragious than ever: Having conceiv'd a through Contempt of the Romans, they laid all waste before 'em in

Thrace

Thrace and Macedonia, sparing neither Age nor Sex, but murdering even Infants as they hung at the Breast. In this Confidence of their own Strength, some of 'em presum'd to approach Constantinople it self, but were severely chastis'd for their Presumption; for the Emperor sent out against 'em a strong Party chosen out of his own Guard, under the Command of John the Patrician, one of the Eunuchs belonging to the Empress, who fell on 'em by Night, as they were drunk and sleepy; and having made a great Slaughter of 'em, cut off their Heads, and sent 'em in Cart-loads up to Monomachus.

By this time the Emperor began to reflect on his partial and imprudent Behaviour to Kezenes, whom therefore he releas'd out of Prison; and upon his engaging to divert 'em from their outrageous Courses, he dismiss'd him to 'em. As he drew near he sent to inform 'em of his Approach, and upon what Errand he was come; they answer'd, and confirm'd their Answer by Oath, that they were ready to submit to him, and be govern'd and directed by his Will; but as soon as they got him into their Power they cut him to pieces, and thereby assur'd the Emperor they would listen to no Terms of Accommodation. Thus the War was continu'd on both sides for several Years together, during which the Imperialists had most commonly the Disadvantage; but the Scythians being at length inform'd, that the Emperor was making such mighty Preparations, as if he seem'd resolv'd to root 'em, if possible, out of the Earth; they were terrify'd at the approaching Storm, and sent to desire Peace from Monomachus, who, after several Difficulties, condescended to a Truce for thirty Years.

Tho' this War, which had been long, bloody, and expensive, was in the End brought to an happy Conclusion, yet was Monomachus surrounded with other Difficulties, from which he found it impossible to extricate himself. For whereas the Charge of his Wars should have made him frugal and deliberate, he liv'd at so profuse and expensive a rate, that he was forc'd to charge his Subjects with several illegal and unreasonable Impositions; which made him hated, and contemn'd at home, whilst the Turks enlarg'd their Conquests, and grievously infested the Provinces abroad. And here it may be observ'd, that this Emperor was, in a great measure, guilty of the Decay, and Ruin of the Eastern Empire; for whereas all the Provinces upon the Borders were usually exempted from paying Tribute, because they undertook to maintain so many Soldiers as were sufficient to guard the Roman Pale, and secure it from the Incursions of the Barbarians, he disbanded those Soldiers, and dissolv'd the Garrisons in those Parts, especially the Army in Iberia, which consisted of fifty thousand Men, and serv'd as a Barrier against the Turks, that he might have a Pretence to raise a Revenue out of that Country. An Act of such pernicious Consequence, as might brand him with Infamy to all Posterity, and render him a dreadful Warning to all profuse and inconsiderate Princes.

Monomachus his Profuseness ruins the Empire.

The Success of the Turkish Arms in Iberia.

However the Emperor, having thus concluded a Peace with the Scythians, was at leisure to observe the Progress of the Turkish Arms in Iberia. The Sultan, affronted at the Reception of his Ambassador, as has been before observ'd, enter'd with all his Forces into that Country; the Inhabitants of which had secur'd themselves and their most valuable Effects in their strong Towns, of which there was great plenty in those Parts; so that hearing the Emperor was preparing a very powerful Army at Cæsarea, which was to be sent against him, he return'd with great Indignation into Media; where finding the People, who had notice of his Approach, had dispos'd of themselves and their Wealth in the same manner those in Iberia had done; he resolv'd to attack some of the Garrisons, and accordingly fate down before Mantzichierta, a Town situate in an open Country, but fortify'd with a triple Wall and deep Ditches. The Situation

ation of this Place made him hope to be Master of it in a short time ; but finding, after he had ply'd it warmly for thirty Days together, that Basilius the Governor, and the rest of the Christians that were in it, were resolv'd to defend it to the utmost ; he began to despair of Success, and was about to have rais'd the Siege, when Alcan, one of his General Officers, prevail'd with him to defer it for one Day longer, and trust the Disposition of the Attacks to his Management. This being granted him, he divided the Army next Day into two Parts, one of which he order'd to gall the Besieg'd with their Arrows from a rising Ground that fronted the Eastern Gate, where the Wall seem'd lower, whilst he led the other on to the Assault, which was directed with great Bravery on the one side, and oppos'd with an equal Resolution on the other. For the Besieg'd pour'd Clouds of Arrows, Darts, and Stones upon the Assailants, of whom great Numbers were slain, and amongst the rest Alcan himself, who, being known by the richness of his Armour, was drawn by the Hair of his Head into the City, and his Head being instantly cut off, was thrown over the Wall among the Turks. Whereupon the Sultan, who, being attended by his chief Officers, had beheld all from an adjacent Eminence, broke up the Siege, pretending some urgent Affairs had call'd him home, but threaten'd to return with greater Forces the Spring following ; which he did some time after in Pursuit of his Cousin Cutlu-Moses, of whom mention has been made already, who fled into Arabia, leaving Tangrolipix to waste and ravage Iberia, 'till the Approach of Michael Acoluthus, who was sent out of the West to repress him, and who, by the Measures he took, threaten'd to force him to a Battel, and oblig'd him to retire with the main Body of his Army to Tauris ; however he left three thousand Turks behind him with Orders to infest the Frontiers of the Empire, which they did afterwards with much Ease, for that

Monomachus had left an Example to his Successors, which they observ'd with too much exactness, through Sloth and Covetousness suffering their Dominions to be torn piece-meal from 'em, as we shall have melancholy Occasion enough to observe in the pursuit of this History.

The Death
of Zoe the Empress.

The Death of the Empress Zoe follow'd soon after, the Loss of whom Monomachus at first lamented with an unmanly Passion, abstaining from all Company, and comparing her to the Angels above; but shortly after address'd himself with as much Gallantry as the Gout had left him to another Lady, the Daughter of an Alan Prince, who then lay as an Hostage at Constantinople. This Lady was brought into the Palace, saluted Augusta, and had he not been restrain'd by the Respect he bore Theodora, and the Infamy of a fourth Marriage, he had, in all probability, marry'd and declar'd her Empress; but, whatever he intended, Death in a little time after put an end to that, and all his other Designs; for the Gout, which some time before had seiz'd on his Limbs, being increas'd by his Intemperance, at length prevail'd inwardly, and left him time enough to consult about, but not to declare or confirm his Successor.

A. D.
1054.

Tho' he had hitherto express'd a great Esteem and Respect for Theodora, yet either for that he thought the Management of Publick Affairs too weighty for a Woman's Shoulders, or else, being induc'd to it by the earnest Persuasions of some about him, especially of John the Eunuch, a despicable unworthy Wretch, who had other Designs in view, he design'd Nicephorus, who commanded the Forces of the Empire in Bulgaria, to succeed him; the Business was manag'd with much Caution and Secrecy, and Nicephorus sent for without the Knowledge, as 'twas thought, of Theodora, who however receiv'd an Account of all their Transactions; and leaving the Emperor in the new Monastery of St. George, which he had built in Mangana, she went, attended by her most faithful Friends, to Constantinople, where, in the great Palace, she was Monomachus dies, and Theodora is declar'd Empress.

proclaim'd and saluted Empress; the News whereof being brought to Monomachus exasperated his Distemper, and left him no other Power than to testify, by a deep Sigh, his Dislike of it, with which he ended his Days, after he had reign'd twelve Years and eight Months, or something more.

Of this Emperor it may be said, that during his Reign, Fortune, by turns, smil'd and frown'd upon him; for as in his Time the Turks, through his natural Laziness, or want of Money, grew exceeding powerful in Asia, and extreamly harass'd the Territories of the Empire, so had he the good Luck to suppress all such as rebell'd against him at home. The best Quality he had was his Charity, for he daily reliev'd the Poor, and built an Hospital for Old Men, whom Age had render'd incapable of getting their own Subsistence; his many ill ones the Reader will find in the Account we have already given of him. Some say, that both he and Zoe dy'd of the Plague, which indeed rag'd so violently at that time in the City, and the Quick were hardly sufficient to bury the Dead; however the best Authors agreed, that he dy'd of the Gout, aggravated by his great Intemperance to Women, in the sixteenth Year of Henry the Third Emperor in the West, and the last of John the Twentieth Pope of Rome, A. D. 1054.

Theodora, having thus receiv'd the Imperial Crown, Theodora's Management.
which she challeng'd as well by Virtue of an Hereditary Right, as the Consent and Approbation of the People, took Care first to chastise such as had propos'd and attempted the Promotion of Nicephorus, whose Estates were all confiscated, and their Persons banish'd. She depriv'd Isaacius Comnenus of his Command in the East, and banish'd Bryennius a Macedonian, whom Monomachus had sent at the Head of his Countrymen against the Turks, because, upon the Death of that Emperor, he had remov'd with the Macedonians under his Command, N without

Michael Stratioti-
cus.

Theodora
dies,

without waiting for her Orders, to Chrysopolis. Theodora, the Eunuch was sent General into the East, where he fought with some Success against the Turks, who, upon the Report of Monomachus his Death, prepar'd for new Attempts against the Empire. The prudent Choice of her Great Officers and Ministers of State made the Management of Affairs easie to her, and agreeable to her People. Being well grown in Years she was advis'd to chuse some fit Person to be her Assistant, and declare him Emperor, which she rejected with a manly Resolution, and sat constantly upon the Bench her self, gave Audience to Ambassadors, created Magistrates, and interpos'd her Opinion and Resolution in all Matters relating to the State, as well publick as private. In this manner she rul'd with great Applause for almost two Years, during which her Subjects enjoy'd a perfect Tranquility, so that they generally wish'd she had either been advanc'd sooner to the Imperial Dignity, or they might have enjoy'd her longer in it; but she was in the end seiz'd with an Illiack Passion, which ended her Days. As soon as her Physician began to despair of her Recovery, Leo, surnam'd Strabospondylus, Chief Minister of State, and the Favourite Eunuchs, consulted on whom they might confer the Government, and continue entire to themselves the Power with which Theodora had entrusted 'em. After some Debates they made Choice of Michael Stratioticus, a Person Old and Decrepid, which together with his Ignorance in State Affairs, for he had from his Youth apply'd himself solely to the Wars, render'd him very unworthy of so Eminent a Station: However, judging him a Person fit for their Purposes, they first made him promise to do nothing without their Knowledge and Consent, and then persuaded Theodora to make him Emperor; which being done, she dy'd in the Month of August, after she had reign'd one Year and nine Months, A. D. 1056.

The Advancement of Michael was manag'd with so much Secrecy, and the Death of Theodora follow'd so immedi-immediately upon it, that Theodorus the President, and Cousin German to Monomachus, knew nothing of it, 'till Michael was declar'd and acknowledg'd Emperor. At which being surpriz'd and incens'd, he summon'd all his Servants, Friends and Dependants to his Assistance, and mov'd in the Evening, with a great Train, through the publick Streets to the Palace, where he protested against what had been done in Favour of Michael, and laid Claim to the Empire as of Right belonging to him, who was so nearly related to the late Emperor Monomachus. In the meantime the Prison upon which ensues a Commotion in the City. Doors were broken open by his Order, and the Malefactors call'd out to his Assistance, so that a general Confusion and Tumult began to threaten the whole City; but the Eunuchs in the Palace having receiv'd the Alarm, prepar'd with great Vigour to suppress him both by Land and Water; which when he understood, he turn'd about, and went to the Great Church, where he hop'd to be receiv'd and own'd by the Patriarch and Clergy, who, contrary to his Expectations, shut the Doors against him, and refus'd to admit him. His last Refuge was the People, who, being generally fond of Innovations, did however in this Conjunction continue firm in their Allegiance, and declar'd all for Michael. In this Condition, abandon'd by his Friends, who in great Numbers began to forsake him, and pursu'd by his Enemies whom he had justly provok'd against him, he fled in a disconsolate Condition with his Son, and took Sanctuary in the Church, from whence he was shortly after taken out, and banish'd to Pergamus, where he had time to reflect on his inconsiderate Undertaking, and laugh at the Vanities of the World.

After this Michael enjoy'd the Imperial Dignity without a Competitor, and in such things as were done by the Advice of those, who had been the Instruments of his Promotion, he acted very well; but whatever he did without their Advice, and in the Execution of which they were not so fitly qualify'd, show'd him

Michael's Behaviour. a weak and unworthy Prince. But he betray'd himself in nothing so much as his Behaviour to the General Officers of the Army, who had been his Fellow-Soldiers under the late Reigns, and whom he ought to have regarded as his principal Support. Among these were Isaacius Comnenus, and Ambustus Catacalo, Men renown'd for their great Services and Experience; the latter of these he remov'd from the Government of Antioch, and upon every Occasion affronted Comnenus. He recall'd Bryennius, whom his Predecessor had banish'd, and sent him into the East against the Turks; but when he desir'd to have his Estate restor'd, which Theodora had taken from him, he gave him a surly Denial, and so prepar'd him to embrace the first Proposal should be offer'd to his Prejudice.

A Conspiracy against him.

Isaacius Comnenus

For when Ambustus and the other Officers had, by reiterated Affronts, been provok'd to conspire against him, their Design was by Ambustus his Advice communicated to Bryennius, as one who was able to assist 'em with a powerful Army; and Bryennius, provok'd at the late Repulse he had receiv'd from the Emperor, concurr'd very readily with them. Being thus, as they conceiv'd, prepar'd for a Revolt, they proceeded to the Choice of a new Emperor, and the Dignity fell, by a general Suffrage, upon Ambustus; but he, tho' a Man of exemplary Valour and Experience, excus'd himself upon the Account of his great Age, and propos'd Isaacius Comnenus as the fittest Person they could promote, to which all unanimously assented; and having confirm'd their Choice by Oath, they all departed from Constantinople, where they met, as it was customary at Easter to receive the Emperor's Bounty, to their several Posts, where each in his respective Station was to promote the general Design. Among the rest Bryennius went to his Charge in the East, with whom John Opsaras, a Patrician, was sent to pay the Soldiers, the only Persons to whom the indiscreet Emperor was not Liberal and Munificent. At a general Muster Bryennius would have had the Gold distributed as he thought thought convenient, which John with great-Obstinacy refus'd, alledging he would fully obey the Orders he had receiv'd from the Emperor; whereat Bryennius was so highly enrag'd that he fell upon him, and having first order'd him to be soundly beaten, committed him to Custody, and then made a Distribution of the Treasure according to his own Fancy. This Proceeding had like to have broken all the Measures of the Conspirators, for it happen'd at that time that Lycantbes, a Patrician, who was General of the Lycæonians and Pysidians, lay with all his Forces near the Army commanded by Bryennius; and being utterly ignorant of the Resolutions lately taken by the other Commanders in the East, concluded that no one could be guilty of so Insolent and Arbitrary a Proceeding, but who aim'd at the Sovereignty, and therefore fell with all his Forces upon Bryennius his Camp, and having taken him Prisoner deliver'd him to Opsaras, whom he set at Liberty, and who, palliating his Revenge with a specious Pretence of Loyalty, pluck'd out his Eyes, and sent him with an Account of what had happen'd to the Emperor.

When the Chief Officers of the East, who were of the Conspiracy, had been inform'd of Bryennius his Misfortune, they began to apprehend, lest he, upon Examination, should reveal their Designs, and therefore chose rather to be in Action, tho' they were not as yet thoroughly ripe for it, than be oppress'd by the Emperor before they had leisure to declare themselves, and decide the Quarrel by the Dint of the Sword.

Accordingly they forc'd Comnenus from his House in Paphlagonia, and having summon'd the Army together in a spacious Plain, he was there by universal Consent saluted Emperor, on the eighth of June, A. D. 1057.

A. D.
1057.

Isaacius Comnenus declar'd Emperor by the Army;

Comnenus, being thus declar'd Emperor, order'd first his Receivers to collect the Revenue and Contributions in the East, and then marching his Army over the River Sangarius in Phrygia Major, he proceeded with with slow Journeys towards Nice, which he was the more willing to get into his Hands, because he judg'd it proper for a Receptacle upon all Occasions. The Soldiers that were quarter'd in it dislodg'd as soon as they heard of his Approach, and retir'd to their own homes, to take Care of their respective Families during these publick Distractions. Some of the Officers fled with the News of this Revolt to Stratoticus, who, tho' he saw that almost all the Forces of the Empire were combin'd against him, yet he refus'd to offer any Conditions of Peace, and prepar'd for a vigorous Resistance. He sent immediately for all the Forces that lay quarter'd in the West, committing 'em to the Conduct of such Macedonians as were Persons of the greatest Quality and Experience in Warlike Affairs; and considering into what Dangers his late Behaviour had betray'd him, he now caress'd both the Officers and Soldiers, encouraging them with many Presents, and large Promises of future Rewards. Having muster'd his Army, he made Choice of Theodorus, Eunuch to the late Empress, and Aaron Ducas, a Man of great Experience, and Brother to Comnenus his Wife, for his Generals.

against
whom Michael sends
his Army.

These Generals march'd at the Head of their Forces to Nicomedia, and from thence sent to break down the Bridge of Sangarius, that Comnenus might not be able to retire back that way, but being forc'd to go about they might be sure to come up to him, so eager were they for an Engagement. Comnenus, on the other Hand, having strongly fortify'd Nice, and left all his Baggage and Carriages in that City, he encamp'd at some distance from the Enemy, and offer'd 'em Battel. Ambustus had the Command of the Left Wing, and Romanus Sclerus of the Right, whilst he himself led the main Battel. At first Aaron, who led the Right Wing of the Emperor's Forces, seem'd to have the better, for he broke the opposite Wing, took Romanus Prisoner, and drove 'em back as far as their Camp, which he might have taken, and obtain'd an entire Victory,

Victory, had he not been too diffident of his Success; for the main Battel began to give Ground, and Comnenus had once Thoughts of flying away, and throwing himself into Nice, when he was inform'd that Ambustus, who had born down all before him, was pierc'd into the Enemy's Camp, which he had taken and plunder'd, at which both he and his Soldiers were so animated, that they charg'd with fresh Vigour, and gave the Emperor's Forces an entire Defeat; many which are were kill'd in the Pursuit, and several Officers of totally principal Note were taken Prisoners. When Michael routed; was first inform'd of the Overthrow of his Forces, he was so surpriz'd, that had not some about him dissuaded him from it, he had sent and offer'd the Imperial Crown to Comnenus. At last several of the chiefest Senators were sent to treat with him, and in Conclusion it was agreed, that Comnenus should be adopted Cæsar, and all his Followers should receive a full Pardon and Indemnity; which was immediately ratify'd by the joyful Emperor, who promis'd to confirm all Comnenus his Officers in their Employments, and in a short time to resign the Administration of Affairs solely to his Conduct.

No Person in the Camp oppos'd this Agreement but Ambustus, who contended, with great Earnestness, That Stratoticus should be depos'd; that they having depriv'd him, by a Solemn Oath, they could not without Perjury re-admit him to the Throne; that if they laid down their Arms, Comnenus would in the end be infallibly poison'd, and they punish'd with the Loss of their Eyes. In this he was underhand encourag'd by the Senators themselves, who were sent to confirm the Agreement in Behalf of the Emperor. These Men represented to Comnenus the great Advantages he had over Stratoticus; how much the one was detested at Constantinople; how earnestly the other was desir'd there; how ready the People were to declare for him at his first Appearance, and how unable Michael was to oppose him.

and he forc'd to resign.

Whilst these things were thus agitating in the Camp, the unhappy Emperor himself made void that Agreement he had just sent to have confirm'd, and partly by fair Words, and partly by Menaces, oblig'd both the Senate and the People to subscribe a Writing, and take an Oath, with most direful Imprecations, never to give Comnenus the Title of Emperor, or own him for their Sovereign; which would have been a very unreasonable Engagement, had he design'd him Cæsar. This Oath was exacted from 'em whilst Comnenus was at a distance from the City, but being approach'd within less than a Day's Journey to Constantinople, they declar'd by common Consent, Comnenus to be Emperor, and adjudg'd all such as should oppose him to lose their Estates, and be declar'd Enemies to the Roman Empire. This being procur'd by the Patriarch, and decreed in the Church, he sent Messengers to Comnenus to invite him to the City, and at the same time, by other Messengers, order'd Stratoticus to resign, and depart from the Palace. At first he had behav'd himself with much Caution and seeming Fidelity to Stratoticus, but now he made it appear how much he had been from the Beginning concern'd in the Revolt. When the Bishops that were sent to Stratoticus deliver'd him their Message, he demanded of 'em what the Patriarch would give him in Exchange for the Empire, and they answer'd, The Kingdom of Heav'n. He divested himself of the Imperial Habit, and retir'd to his own House in the Castle, after he had reign'd one Year; and Comnenus arriving in the same Evening, was, the next Morning, being the first of September, crown'd in the great Church by the Hands of the Patriarch, and declar'd Emperor of the Romans.

*Comne-
nus his Behaviour
in the Empire.*

Isaacius Comnenus, having by these means obtain'd the Empire, very liberally rewarded such as had been assistant to him, particularly Michael Cerularius the Patriarch, whom he exceedingly reverenc'd, and highly preferr'd his Nephews; and whereas he had rais'd

rais'd himself to the Empire by the Force of Arms, he immediately caus'd Money to be coin'd with his Image holding a Sword. He abrogated all the Acts of Stratoticus without Distinction, and rescinded those of many of his Predecessors; proceeding with an equal Severity to all, as well Senators as common People. At length he fell upon the Monasteries, from whom he took what the Liberality of former Princes had enrich'd 'em withal, and allow'd 'em no more than a bare Subsistence. These his Proceedings made him fear'd more than lov'd by his Subjects, among whom no one was found of Courage enough to blame or reprehend him except the Patriarch; who presuming upon his great Authority with him, and the Services he had lately done him, was as insolent in his Reproofs, as boundless in his Demands, threatening, that unless he comply'd, to pull him down from the Throne, to which he had so lately exalted him; at which the haughty Emperor was so incens'd, that he immediately banish'd him; and having first extorted from him the Charter of Privileges and Immunities, granted by Monomachus to his Monastery of Mangana, he preferr'd Constantinus Lichudes to be Patriarch in his room.

The warlike Temper and resolute Behaviour of this Prince so far influenc'd the Councils of his Neighbours, that they attempted nothing memorable against him: For tho' the Hungarians and Scythians show'd some Inclinations to a Rupture, yet upon his first Preparations they su'd for Peace; so that hardly any thing memorable happen'd during the short Reign of Comnenus, who in the End quitted the Empire, with a Resignation equal to the Resolution with which at first he assum'd it. One Day, whilst he was Hunting, he was blasted by a Wind or Lightning, which threw him into such a Distemper, that despairing of a Recovery, and conscious to himself of the unlawful Means by which he had obtain'd the Imperial Dignity, he made a voluntary Resignation, and retir'd into 1060.

A. D.

His Resignation,

and Cha-
racter.

a Monastery, where he discharg'd the meanest Offices of the House, and spent the Remainder of his Days in continu'd Acts of Devotion and Contrition, having reign'd in all two Years and three Months. The Character left us of this Prince represents him as a Man of mix'd Qualities, in some Things very commendable, in others as much to be reprehended. He was by Nature Valiant, in his Disposition Arrogant, dextrous in the Dispatch of Business, and inflexible in any thing he had once resolv'd upon ; he was exceeding skilful in Military Affairs, and tho' illiterate himself, yet he was a great Encourager of Learning and learned Men. When he was tax'd with his ambitious affecting the Empire, he reply'd, That the Domination of a Fellow-Servant, who deny'd him his just Reward, was intolerable. He is said to have been so exceeding Chaste, that falling ill once when he was from home, and his Physicians prescribing the Company of a Woman as a means to relieve him, he utterly refus'd to meddle with any other than his own Wife.

Constantinus Ducas.

A. D.
1061.

Before Comnenus resign'd the Empire he was advis'd to provide it with a Successor, in the Choice of whom he rather consulted the publick Safety of the State, than the private Interest of his own Family ; for tho' he had several Children and near Relations of his own, yet he made Choice of Constantinus Ducas, who was esteem'd a Man very worthy so high a Dignity. Ducas, being thus elected by Comnenus, and approv'd of by the People, was crown'd with great Solemnity at Constantinople ; having formerly discharg'd the greatest Offices in the State with the general Approbation, he was esteem'd the fittest Man in the Empire for that high Dignity, tho' he afterwards appear'd, in the Course of his Administration, subject to some Vices altogether unworthy of a Prince. He began his Reign with the Promotion of several Persons, who had appear'd the best affected to him in his private State, and the Restitution of others, whom the Severity of his Predecessor had depriv'd and excluded ;

not-

notwithstanding which he narrowly escap'd being oppress'd by a Conspiracy form'd against him by some of his most intimate Friends, which, being fortunately discover'd and suppress'd, he proceeded with no greater Severity against those who had ungratefully fomented it, than to a Confiscation of their Estates: After this he apply'd himself with great Diligence to the Affairs of State, and acted upon all Occasions with so much Justice and Moderation, that he had deserv'd to have been reckon'd among the good Princes, had not all his good Qualities been poison'd by an insatiate Covetousness, which betray'd him to the severe Reflections of his Subjects at home, and expos'd the Territories of the Empire to the Insults of the barbarous Nations abroad; for Ducas influenc'd by some Maxims that had lately seduc'd several of his Predecessors, out of a sordid and unseasonable Principle of good Husbandry, suffer'd the Frontiers to lye naked, and by that means gave the Turks an Opportunity of extending their Conquest, which they did on every side. To this chiefly may be attributed the Ruin of the Eastern Empire; for the Soldiers being thus neglected and unrewarded, grew remiss and unactive, and the Poison which might have been stopp'd in time, diffus'd it self by degrees, infected first the extream Parts, 'till at length it became invincible, and by an irresistible Progress in the End seiz'd on the Head. His usual Maxim was by no means to begin a War, but if the Empire was threaten'd with one from abroad, he maintain'd it to be at least cheaper, tho' not so honourable, to court the Barbarians with Presents, and to buy a Peace rather than to be at the Expence of Levies and Musters.

Ducas his Covetousness very prejudicial to the Empire.

This Disposition in the Emperor, as it occasion'd the Loss of some Provinces in the East, so it encourag'd the Uzians, a Scythian People, to make a terrible Irruption into the Empire; for having taken Nicophorus Botoniates, who was afterwards Emperor, and Basilus Apocapes Prisoner; they pass'd the Ister to the 1067.

A. D.

The Scythians Invading the Empire are defeated by the Hungarians.

Number of five hundred thousand Men, and wasting all the Country thereabouts, march'd up into Macedonia, and from thence into Greece, where they liv'd at Discretion, destroying all before 'em. Tho' the Emperor seem'd sufficiently sensible of the Calamities of his Subjects, yet he made no Preparations to remove their Oppressors, but answer'd those who earnestly conjur'd him to it, That it was impossible to repel 'em. So that instead of marching at the Head of an Army against 'em, he endeavour'd to purchase a Peace by rich Presents made to the Chief Officers, and a Promise of an Annual Tribute for the future. When he found that, notwithstanding all this, they continu'd their Hostilities with more Barbarity than before; and being revil'd by his Subjects, as one that sacrific'd the Empire to his own fordid Temper and miserable Covetousness: In this Calamity he betook himself to Prayer, and order'd a general Fast to be observ'd throughout his Dominions, after which he march'd out against 'em with no more than a handful of Men, as some have written, tho' others say his Army consisted of no less than an hundred and fifty thousand Men, which however was far inferior to the Number of the Scythians; who, being first exceedingly weaken'd by the Plague that had rag'd in a terrible manner among 'em, were suddenly set upon by the Hungarians, whose Territories they had wasted in their Passage into the Empire, and who cut 'em entirely off, and did the Emperor's Business for him without the Assistance of his own Army.

This was the most remarkable Action that happen'd during the Reign of this unactive Prince, towards the End of which many of the Churches and most magnificent Palaces at Constantinople were overthrown by an Earthquake, which was attended by a Comet following the Sun with its Tail directed to the East: It was seen by the Inhabitants of Constantinople for forty Days together, and serv'd to remind the Emperor of his approaching End; for having contracted a Disease, which which by this time grew incurable, he apply'd his Thoughts to the Settlement of the Succession in his Family. He had three Sons by the Empress Endocia, whereof Constantine the youngest, being born after his Advancement to the Empire, had some time before been invest'd with the Imperial Ornaments, but now he caus'd his other two, Michael Ducas and Andronicus, to be declar'd Emperors, and left the Empire to 'em all ; but considering they were young and incapable, he first requir'd an Oath from the Empress never to marry, which, being taken with great Solemnity, was lodg'd in the Hands of the Patriarch, and then appointed her to be Regent during the Minority of her Children. After this he exacted an Oath from all the Senators, that they would admit of none for Emperors but his Sons ; and having, as he thought, by this means settled the Imperial Crown upon his Posterity, he dy'd after a Reign of five Years and six Months, in the sixtieth Year of his Age, in the fifth Indiction, A. D. 1067. Ducas his Death,

He was a Man of exemplary Piety and Justice, unless sometimes he was bias'd by his Avarice, which made him in the Decision of Controversies, not always observe the Prescript of Laws, but to determine contrary to Law, and with a Respect of Persons. Tho' he was unlearn'd himself, yet he had a great Esteem for learned Men, declaring often, That it would have pleas'd him better to have been enobled by Learning than Sovereignty. He proceeded with much Moderation against such as conspir'd against him : He was a great Lover of Plain-dealing, and Men of Integrity ; and had it not been for his abominable Covetousness, which reign'd predominant over all the rest of his Qualities, he had undoubtedly enrich'd the Throne with many Royal Virtues. and Character.

Constantine was no sooner dead but the Turks, hearing the Management of Affairs was lodg'd in the Hands of a Woman, in Contempt of her Sex, and the tender Years of her Sons, fell with great Confidence into the Provinces of the Empire, wasting Me- The Turks renew their Incursions into the Empire.
sopotamia,

Sopotamia, Cilicia and Cappadocia at pleasure ; which being reported at Constantinople very much afflicted the Empress, who found her self in no Condition to oppose 'em. The greatest part of the Army had been disbanded in her Husband's Days, that which was on Foot was Undisciplin'd and Licentious ; the People in general were dissatisfy'd, and some, who were Enemies to her Family, seem'd to commiserate the present State of the Empire, which requir'd a Man of Worth and Courage at the Helm, instead of a weak, helpless, and unregarded Woman ; and this they urg'd with the greater Heat, because they thought the Empress would never think of marrying in regard of the Oath she had lately taken. Eudocia was quickly inform'd of what had been mov'd with so much freedom against her, and knew the only way she had left to prevent the Mischiefs with which she was threaten'd, was to marry some Valiant deserving Man, who, being entrusted with an absolute Command, might Protect her and her Children.

Romanus
Diogenes.

Romanus Diogenes was at that time a Prisoner at Constantinople, where he had been committed by the Empress, to whom he was accus'd as one who affected the Empire. He was a Person of a very beautiful Aspect and generous Temper : Being about this time call'd out to receive the Sentence of Death, which his Ambition had deserv'd, the whole Assembly were touch'd at the Appearance of the unhappy Prisoner, whose Illustrious Birth, for he was descended from the Emperor Romanus Argyrus, and Excellent Qualifications, seem'd to have design'd him for a more honourable Fate, with the Considerations of which no one was more affected than the Empress her self. Having therefore put a stop to the Sentence they were ready to denounce against him, she gently check'd him for his ill-tim'd Ambition ; and having obtain'd an Oath from him for his future Fidelity, she first set him at Liberty, and shortly after made him General of all her Forces, firmly resolving in her self to marry him,

if

if she could but recover the Writing, in which her Oath was compris'd, out of the Hands of the Patriarch. In this she was assisted by a Favourite Eunuch, who apply'd himself with much Art and Diffimulation to that Prelate, telling him that the Empress had cast her Eyes upon one Bardas, a young Gentleman of the Court, and the Patriarch's Nephew, and was so well affected to him, that she would gladly marry him, and make him Emperor, if the Patriarch would discharge her of the Oath she had lately taken, and convince her of the Lawfulness of it. Johannes Xiphilinus, a Person of great Probity and Learning, was at that time Patriarch of Constantinople; and tho' he was otherwise averse to the Honours and Vanities of this World, yet being dazzl'd with the Prospect of his Nephew's Promotion, readily promis'd the Eunuch to concur with the Empress in whatever she should desire of him relating to that Matter, and accordingly shortly after represented to the Senators, whom he sent for one by one, "the dangerous Condition of the Empire, continually threaten'd with Foreign Invasions, which were not to be repress'd by the Hands of a weak Woman, or the Authority of young Children, and therefore requir'd the Valour and Judgment of some deserving Man. Then he took an Occasion to exclaim against the rash Oath, which had been unjustly impos'd upon the Empress, rather to satisfy the jealous Humour of the late Emperor, than for any Advantage could arise from it to the Commonwealth; he therefore urg'd how reasonable it was for the Empress to be discharg'd from the Observance of it, that being thus set at Liberty she might make Choice of some Worthy Person, able to undergo the Burden of Affairs, and to take upon him, in this visible time of Danger, the Protection both of the Empress, her Children, and the Empire. Those few of the Senate, who were not mov'd by these Arguments, were overcome by more prevailing Gifts

A. D.
1068.
Diogenes
marries the Empress.

Gifts from the Empress ; so that the Patriarch, by a Publick Act of Senate, restor'd the Writing to her ; and she, having thus circumvented the Patriarch, and got her self discharg'd from her Oath, shortly after marry'd Diogenes, who was thereupon Proclaim'd Emperor.

Diogenes being thus, by a surprising Turn of Fortune, advanc'd from a Prison to the Throne, immediately consulted what were the most proper Ways to restrain the Progress of the Turks, who grew every Day more terrible, and threaten'd the Empire with an Universal Inundation. He found the Armies of the Empire in a very desperate Condition, which was chiefly owing to the Avarice and Inactivity of the late Emperors. The Provinces were utterly impoverish'd, and the Affairs at home in an unsettl'd Condition ; notwithstanding all these Inconveniencies, being a Man of a hardy resolute Nature, he pass'd over into Asia at the Head of a small Army ill provided, using all the means possible to recruit and supply it as he march'd along. Shortly after he was inform'd that the Turkish Sultan hearing of his Approach, and ignorant of what Numbers he was leading against him, was retir'd himself ; but having divided his Army into two Bodies, sent one of 'em into the Southern Parts of Asia, and the other into the North, which destroy'd all the Country as they march'd along ; and surprising the City of Neo Cæsaria, now Nexaria in Pontus, had sack'd it, and were gone off with a rich Booty. Hereupon selecting out the lightest Troops he had in his Army, he coasted the Country with great Expedition, and never rested 'till he was got betwixt the Turks and home ; and falling suddenly upon 'em charg'd 'em so briskly that they fled away in great Confusion, and left all their Baggage and Carriages, and whatever they got in their late Expedition, and the Sack of Neo-Cæsarea behind 'em ; from thence the Emperor march'd to

His Success
against the Turks.

Aleppo,

Aleppo, which was deliver'd up to him, together with Hierapolis, where he shortly after built a strong Castle. Here whilst he lay, being inform'd that part of his Army, which he had detach'd to join the Forces he at first had left behind him, were in danger of being overthrown by the Turks, he decamp'd with all Expedition, and march'd to their Relief; but the Turks far exceeding him in Numbers, surrounded him on a sudden as he lay encamp'd near 'em, and threaten'd him with an unavoidable Destruction. At the same time the Governor of Aleppo treacherously revolted from him, and went over to the Enemy, who, in great Confidence of an assur'd Victory, were already dividing the Spoils; but the Emperor, without founding a Trumpet, issu'd suddenly out of his Camp, and fell with great Violence upon 'em, as they lay in Security, little prepar'd for so unexpected an Attack, so that they were easily routed, and he might have had an entire Victory over 'em, had he thought it advisable to pursue 'em far from his Camp. Several Towns were after this deliver'd up to him as the Consequence of his Victory, and having dispers'd his Army into Winter-Quarters in Cilicia, and the Parts adjacent, he return'd himself to Constantinople; where he had hardly time to repose himself, before he was inform'd, that the restless Turks were again Invading the Frontiers of the Empire after their usual manner, and had done much Mischief about Neo-Cæsarea; so that in the beginning of the Spring he was forc'd to renew his Expedition against them, and having repress'd their Fury in those Parts, he retir'd into Cappadocia, where he was inform'd that the Turks, having defeated Philaretus, whom Diogenes had left for the Security of the Frontiers upon the Euphrates, had afterwards sack'd Iconium, a rich and populous City in Cilicia; whereupon he prepar'd to march against 'em in Person, but hearing that upon the Report of his coming they were re-

O

tir'd,

tir'd, he sent the Governor of Antioch to stop their Passage near Mopsuestia, who found the Work, in a great Measure, done to his Hand by the Armenians, who fell upon 'em in the Plains of Tarsus, and stripp'd 'em of all their rich Booty; and they hearing that the Emperor's Forces were approaching fled away by Night, and with great Difficulty escap'd into their own Country; which the Emperor understanding, and the Year being far advanc'd, he first settled the Affairs of the Provinces, and then return'd once more to Constantinople, where he made vigorous Preparations for a powerful Expedition against the Turks the Spring following.

It is not to be conceiv'd what great Alterations were wrought in the Army in so short a time, as since this Emperor's Advancement; Levies were regularly made, the Legions were duly Officer'd, and the Officers justly encourag'd; so that had not Diogenes his Authority come to an untimely End, he had in all likelihood been as terrible to his Neighbours as most of his Predecessors; but Fortune appear'd as absolute in his Destruction, as she had been before in his Exaltation, and Fate had determin'd otherwise of the Empire.

In the beginning of the Spring the Emperor march'd into Asia, and muster'd his Forces in Armenia, where one of the Legions mutiny'd against him, for that they thought him too severe in his Discipline of the Army; but he, with an unshaken Constancy, threaten'd to turn the rest of the Army against 'em, and so quickly pacify'd em. In the mean time the Turks began to be in Motion on the other side, and several Actions happen'd between Parties detach'd from both Armies, in one of which Nicephorus Basilacius, who commanded as General for the Emperor, was taken Prisoner, and honourably us'd by Axan, the Turkish Sultan, and Son of Tangrolipix.

This Prince, being a Man of great Experience and Sagacity, reflecting on the doubtful Event of War, and the numerous Forces the Emperor had rais'd against him, sent his Ambassadors to Diogenes with Proposals for a firm and honourable Peace; but the Emperor inclining inadvisedly to the Advice of some about him, who persuaded him that this Condescension in the Sultan proceeded from Fear, and an Apprehension of his Power, return'd a haughty Answer by the Ambassadors, and prepar'd for an Engagement. A great Body of his Troops, under the Command of Rufelius, one of his most experienc'd Officers, was absent, and a Company of Scythians, who serv'd in the Roman Camp, revolted to the Turks, and there was great reason to think that their Countrymen, who were left behind, would soon follow their Example; notwithstanding which the Emperor, either presuming that the Strength he had remaining was sufficient for the Service, or being hurry'd by his Destiny, drew out his Forces into Order of Battel, and fell upon the Enemy; who still flattering themselves with some hopes of an Accommodation, were very much surpriz'd to be thus unexpectedly charg'd, and behav'd themselves like Men, who were equally unwilling to fight and to fly. However the Dispute was continu'd with various Success on both sides the greatest part of the Day; for tho' the Turks sometimes gave Ground, yet they kept themselves in Order, and charg'd briskly upon the Romans, 'till Diogenes, who was by this time advanc'd at some distance from his Camp, which he left weakly guarded, began to apprehend lest the Enemy, who were superior to him in Numbers, should assault and take it, and therefore perceiving the Night to approach he sounded a Retreat, and retir'd in good Order with that part of the Army which he commanded in Person: But Andronicus, the Son of John Ducas, Brother to the late Emperor Constantine, who look'd on Diogenes his good Fortune with a malicious Eye, and had a great Body

*The Turks
make Offers for a Peace
which are rejected.*

of the Roman Forces under his Command, publish'd boldly, to those who were near him, that the Emperor fled ; and to encrease the Confusion he saw 'em in, and confirm their Fears, he suddenly turn'd his Horse about, and fled with great Precipitation to the Camp, and was follow'd in a disorderly manner by the rest of the Army, whom the Turks pursu'd, and did great Execution upon the Fugitive Christians.

The Emperor defeated and taken Prisoner,

The Emperor, seeing the Condition his Forces were in, did all that lay in his Power to make 'em stand ; but they, being press'd hard by the Enemy, were deaf to all Orders, and shifted every Man for himself. The Emperor, being thus forsaken by his Army, and oppress'd by the Multitude of his Enemies, many of whom he slew with his own Hands, was taken Prisoner, having first receiv'd several Wounds, and had his Horse kill'd under him. When first the Sultan heard of his being taken he could hardly give Credit to it, 'till he was assur'd, by the Ambassadors he had lately sent, that it was the Emperor, and by Basiliacius, who fell down at his Feet, and paid him the Honours due from a Subject to a Sovereign ; whereupon Axan embrac'd the Royal Prisoner, who seem'd dejected, and asham'd of his Captivity, and advis'd him to bear with Patience the Chance of War, which gives the Victory not always to the Brave, but Fortunate ; promising, at the same time, to use him not like a Captive, but an Emperor, which he did accordingly, lodging him in a Royal Tent, entertaining him at his own Table, and releasing such Prisoners for whose Liberty the Emperor petition'd ; and when he had thus entertain'd him with great Magnificence for several Days together, a perpetual Peace was concluded betwixt 'em, and the Emperor dismiss'd with such Honours as never could have been expected at the Hands of an Enemy and Barbarian. Being thus dismiss'd he went attended with the Turkish Ambassadors, who were to see the Peace ratify'd at Constantinople, to Theodosiopolis, where he attended and is honourably treated by the Sultan, and dismiss'd.

tended some time for the Cure of his Wounds, designing, as soon as he was recover'd, to proceed on to the Imperial City, where such Alterations had been made during the unfortunate Prince his Captivity, as promis'd him but an uncomfortable Welcome. For John, the Brother of Constantinus Ducas, and Pfellus a chief Senator, and others of the same Faction, hearing Diogenes was taken Prisoner, thrust Eudocia the Empress from the Government, and having forc'd her into a Monastery, proclaim'd her eldest Son, Michael Ducas, Emperor; who being young and ignorant, John acted as his Guardian, and arrogated to himself the sole Management of Affairs, preferring Pfellus, and such other of his Accomplices as had been instrumental in the late Revolution, and discountenancing all those who seem'd in the least displeas'd at it.

In the mean time hearing Diogenes was releas'd, and that, being recover'd of his Wounds, he was approaching the Imperial City, he issu'd out Letters in the young Emperor's Name, commanding all the Governors of the Provinces, through which he was to pass, not to receive or obey Diogenes as Emperor, but to deny him all the Honours due to that high Dignity; and being inform'd that upon the News of so unexpected a Revolution he was fortifying himself in a Castle call'd Docia, whither some of his most faithful Friends resorted to him, he sent Andronicus his eldest Son, Diogenes his inveterate Enemy against him. Andronicus having easily defeated him, pursu'd the unfortunate Prince to Adana, a City in Cilicia, where, being closely besieg'd by Andronicus, he was at length forc'd to surrender upon Condition he might retire to a private Life, and live unmolested. Andronicus, having thus got him into his Power, carry'd him into Phrygia in expectation of farther Orders from the Court. Here Diogenes fell dangerously ill, being, as many suspected, secretly poison'd; and, as if all this were not sufficient, his Eyes were shortly after in a barbarous manner pull'd out, and he confin'd to the 1071.

A. D.

Diogenes
his Death.

Island Prota, where he ended his Days in a most miserable Manner; for as there was no Care taken of his Wounds his Eyes putrify'd, and Worms bred out of the Putrification, which created such an abominable Smell, that no one could endure to come near him. This unfortunate Prince suffer'd all this with an admirable Patience, and dy'd soon after in the Month of October, after he had reign'd three Years and eight Months, A. D. 1071.

Some say the young Emperor was wholly ignorant of this barbarous Cruelty, and that it was done by the Contrivance and Authority of John, his Uncle; however it were, he must be allow'd to have been as unfortunate, and to have deserv'd it as little as any of his Predecessors. All his Personal Mèrit, and Publick Zeal for the Welfare of his Country, could not avert the Divine Indignation, for being a Party to that Breach of Oath in Eudocia the Empress, who herself receiv'd but small Satisfaction from so egregious a Prevarication; for as at first his necessary Attendance in the Wars forc'd her Husband from her Embraces, so was She herself at last shut up in a Monastery, and not suffer'd by her Presence to Administer to him, to Comfort and Condole with him in the utmost of his Extremities, and the severest Trials.

Diogenes being thus remov'd, to the great Detriment of the Empire; Michael Ducas was generally receiv'd for Emperor, but being sluggish, and incapable, the chief Management of Affairs resided in his Uncle John and his Family, who govern'd all with an undisputed Authority, and apply'd their Power to the Oppression of those they were bound to protect. As soon as Alexander heard of the miserable End of the late Emperor, he resented it with a generous Indignation, and conceiving the perpetual League he had so lately concluded with Diogenes, was hereby render'd ineffectual, he resolv'd instantly to revenge the Death of his Allie, and to Invade the Imperial Provinces, not so much now for the sake of Spoil, but as one who resolv'd perfectly to Conquer what he Invaded, and Possess what he had once Conquer'd.
for

The Emperor hearing of the great Preparations of the Turks, first sent Isaac Comnenus, Son of the late Emperor Comnenus, against them; who, marching at the Head of a numerous Army, at first had several Advantages over the Infidels, whose advanc'd Parties he engag'd with Success; but being too hasty to bring it to a general Engagement, he was, after an obstinate Dispute on both Sides, totally defeated, his Army put to the Rout, and himself taken Prisoner, and forc'd some time after to redeem himself with a vast Sum of Money. In the mean while the Emperor, having rais'd another Army, appointed his Uncle John Ducas Commander in Chief, who had, in all probability, succeeded in his Expedition had it not been for Rufelius, or Urselius, a Gaul, who with some Troops of that Nation which he commanded, having revolted from the Emperor, defeated John near the River Sangarius, and took him Prisoner; and tho' he shortly after releas'd him, and join'd with him against the Turks, yet were his Troops so broken by the late Action, and the Spirits of the Soldiers in general so discompos'd, that Axan engag'd them on a sudden, overthrew, and took 'em both Prisoners, and had undoubtedly pursu'd his Conquests without any Opposition, had he not been diverted by the Motions of Cutlu-Moses, of whom mention has been made already, who fled from Tangrolipix, the late Sultan, but hearing of his Death return'd with great Forces out of Arabia, and laying a Claim to the Sovereignty, prepar'd to decide the Controversie by a Battel.

These Divisions among the Turks must in time exceedingly have broken their Strength, to the great Benefit of Christendom, had not the Caliph of Babylon, who, tho' he had been depriv'd of his Temporal Sovereignty, yet continu'd to exercise an Authority over them in Matters of Religion, represented to 'em the

*The Turks
defeat the Roman
Army.*

great Danger they were in by their Intestine Diffentions, which had already destroy'd the Great, and otherwise Invincible Empire of the Saracens, and would infallibly do as much by them, did they not come to a speedy Agreement, and arm mutually against the Christians. These Words, which carry'd an unanswerable Weight with them, wrought so reasonable an Effect upon the Competitors, that they immediately laid down their Arms, and agreed to be determin'd by the Caliph's Arbitration; who instantly decreed that Axan should enjoy, with an undisputed Right, the new Monarchy so lately erected by his Father in the Upper Asia, and should assist Cutlu-Moses and his Sons in the Conquest of such Parts as they afterwards obtain'd, and call'd from them Turcomania, where they were to rule with an absolute and independent Authority. This Order, so pernicious to the Constantinopolitan Empire, was pursu'd with such Application, that in a short time they subdu'd all Media, the Provinces of Lycaonia, Cappadocia, Pontus, Bithynia, and in the End made Nice the Seat of their Empire.

Nor is this their extraordinary Progress to be wonder'd at, considering it happen'd during the sluggish Reigns of the present Emperor Michael Ducas, and his Successor Nicephorus Botoniates, whose Weakness and Incapacity encourag'd other Pretenders to the Imperial Dignity, some of whom, the better to pursue their Pretensions, were not asham'd to join with the Turks themselves, and make use of their Assistance; it being natural to Ambition to apply without Shame the most infamous Means to the obtaining their unwarrantable Ends. Among these, in the first Place, was Rufelius before mention'd, who having, from his Youth, serv'd in the Roman Army, had acquir'd much Experience and Reputation; and tho' his late Revolt had deservedly render'd him suspected to the Emperor, yet being redeem'd out of Captivity by his Wife, he was restor'd to Favour, and entrusted with a considerable Com-

An Agreement between the Turks extremely prejudicial to the Christians.

Com-

Command in the Lesser Asia, where having join'd to him several Troops of his own, and other Nations, and being secretly promis'd the Protection of the Turks, he threw off his Obedience to the Authority that had sent him thither, and aspir'd at nothing less than the Empire. Rufelius Usurps.

Michael, upon the first notice of his Rebellion, sent several Commanders of great Esteem against him, who, by their several Overthrows, serv'd only to encrease his Hopes and Presumption. Some he circumvented by Fraud, or over-power'd by sudden and unexpected Onsets, and the rest, being assisted by the Turks, he defeated in open Battel; 'till at length the Emperor was advis'd to send Alexius Comnenus, who was afterwards Emperor, against him. Alexius, tho' at that time very young, yet was even then look'd upon to be a Man subtle and daring, and therefore judg'd the fitter to contend with Rufelius. He accordingly in a few Days, with a wonderful Success, put a stop to the Course of the Usurper's Fortune, and reduc'd him to such Straits that he was forc'd to apply himself to Tutach, who commanded at that time for the Turks, with whom he offer'd to join both his Interest and his Forces. Alexius, who well knew the Consequence of such a Conjunction, resolv'd, if possible, to prevent it; he therefore, by Messengers sent on purpose to Tutach, represented to him, The Peace that was at that time betwixt the Emperor and the Sultan, which it was his Duty religiously to observe: He told him Rufelius was equally obnoxious to the Turks and the Romans; that having conquer'd the latter his Ambition would make him carry his Army into Persia, where he would repeat the same Hostilities he had already committed in the Lesser Asia; and knowing the Mercenary Mind of the Barbarian, and how powerful Rufelius his Presents had formerly been, he offer'd him an immense Sum of Money, upon Condition he would deliver the Usurper up into his Hands; and concluded by telling him, He would not only oblige the Emperor, who was ready to reward him for so seasonable a piece of Service, but would do a thing highly acceptable to the Sultan himself, who had great reason to be offended at a Man of Rufelius his ambiguous Temper, who had, by Turns, been a Traitor as well to the Turks as the Romans.

and is sup-
press'd by
Alexius.

Tutach was affected with no part of this Message, so much as that wherein mention was made of the Reward. Having therefore, after a short Consultation, demanded a certain Sum, which was readily promis'd him by Alexius, he seiz'd suddenly on Rufelius, and sent him bound to Amasia, where the Roman General then lay, who, with much difficulty, rais'd the Money by a Contribution from the Inhabitants of that City, and sent Rufelius to Constantinople, having first order'd him to be blinded, as some have alledg'd, tho' others affirm the contrary; after which he reduc'd all those Towns that had either declar'd for Rufelius when first he usurp'd, or had been forc'd by him afterwards. Having, in the best manner he could, compos'd the Disorders of those Parts, he return'd to the Imperial City, the Affairs of which were then in the utmost Confusion, for the People were generally dissatisfy'd with the Government, and almost every Day receiv'd some new Ground for Complaints.

About this time the City was afflicted with a grievous Famine, during which the covetous and improvident Emperor, who ought to have reliev'd the Inhabitants with a Fatherly Affection, lessen'd the Measure of the publick Corn, and consequently rais'd the Price of it, which deservedly got him the Surname of Parapinaces. His Avarice had render'd him so ungracious to the People, that they seem'd prepar'd to lay hold on the first Opportunity to remove him, of which tho' he was sufficiently sensible, yet he took no Care, by any popular Act, to recommend himself to 'em.

Nicepho-
rus Botonates.

During these Jealousies and Discontents at home, the Turks, having renew'd the War, prevail'd on every side abroad. Nicephorus Botoniates had been sent to com-

command the Forces of the Empire in Asia, where being render'd considerable by his many Services, and having wonderfully enrich'd himself, by which means he was enabl'd to bribe the Turks to countenance his Undertakings; he resolv'd no longer to serve a Prince so universally contemn'd and dislik'd, but to set up for himself. Accordingly having first try'd the Temper of his Soldiers, whom he had oblig'd by his Liberality, he enter'd into a Treaty with the Turks, who made a great Advantage of those frequent Revolutions in the Empire, and was shortly after declar'd Emperor by the Army.

A. D.
1078.

Michael was so ill prepar'd for such a Defection, that he receiv'd the News of it with the greatest Consternation, which was aggravated, because much about the same time he was inform'd Nicephorus Bryennius, who commanded in Dyrrachium, was preparing for the like Attempt upon the Imperial Authority in the West, and was so far from moving to his Assistance against Botoniates, that trusting to his own Strength, and the Affection of his Soldiers, he resolv'd to declare against 'em both. In this Extremity he cast his Eyes upon Robert Guiscard, a Norman by Birth, but at that time Duke of Calabria in Italy, to whose Daughter he had promis'd his Son Constantine in Marriage; but Robert was at that time too much employ'd at home to support his Allie, so that Michael, unable of himself to oppose his Adversaries, and despairing of Assistance from abroad, upon a certain Information that Botoniates was approaching the Imperial City at the Head of a numerous Army, compos'd as well of Turks as Christians, he submitted to an invincible Necessity, and having first endeavour'd to soften Nicephorus by an humble submissive Message, he with a seeming Chearfulness resign'd the Imperial Ornaments, and retir'd into a Monastery, out of which he was shortly after remov'd, and made Arch-Bishop of Ephesus.

Michael
resigns.

Thus

Thus ended the Reign of a Prince, who, succeeding one who had deserv'd so well, and been so serviceable to the Empire, was from the Beginning very unacceptable to his Subjects; tho' in some Respects he was worthy of Commendation, for he was naturally addicted to Learning, which was almost the only thing that met with Encouragement throughout his Reign; for besides his excessive Covetousness, he was subject to detract from and oppress such as were more deserving than himself. How he behav'd himself under his new Office is left uncertain, tho' we shall have occasion to make some mention of him upon another Account hereafter.

and Nicephorus acknowledged Emperor.

Bryennius usurps in the West.

Immediately upon this Resignation of Michael, Nicephorus enter'd Constantinople, where he was acknowledged Emperor on the twenty fifth of March, 1078, and being crown'd by the Hands of the Patriarch, prepar'd with all diligence to reduce Bryennius, whom he consider'd as a dangerous Competitor, both in respect of his Personal Abilities, and the great Courage and Discipline of his Troops. Bryennius was descended from an Illustrious Family, and so well qualify'd both in his Person and his Mind, that he seem'd design'd by Nature from his Birth to Command. As he march'd Eastward from Dyrrachium, the Cities through which he pass'd receiv'd him with open Arms, and reiterated Acclamations, and his Party encreas'd so visibly every Day, that for some time it was doubtful who was the Person design'd to be obey'd. Botoniates was not so well secur'd of the Affections of his People at home, to undertake the Expedition himself, but committed the Conduct of the War to Alexius Comnenus, who, tho' created General in Chief of all the Forces for that purpose, with some Unwillingness undertook it; for as the Eastern Forces were chiefly employ'd for the Defence of the Frontiers against the Turks, who grew every Day more powerful, so the greatest Part of those in the West had declar'd for Bryennius, and left an inconsiderable Body to oppose him.

Alexius

Alexius was sent at the Head of these against Bryennius, having receiv'd the Promise of being reinforc'd with some Turkish Auxiliaries ; but without waiting for their Arrival he muster'd his Army, and began his March, well knowing how favourable the least Delay would be to Bryennius, to whom the People in general were so well affected ; and considering how much he was inferior to the Enemy in Strength, he prepar'd rather to circumvent him by Stratagems, than oppose him in the Field.

Accordingly he endeavour'd, as much as he could, to conceal from Bryennius, in his Marches and Encampments, the Weakness of his Forces ; and when, after several Attempts on each side, and Skirmishes by Parties, he thought fit to bring it to a general Engagement near Calaura in Thrace, he made so good a use of his Ground, and so artfully dispos'd his Forces, that Bryennius was in the end defeated and taken Prisoner. The Fortune of the Day continu'd doubtful for some time, Alexius making that good by his Stratagems which he wanted in Men ; tho' had the Scythians, that serv'd under Bryennius, pursu'd the Advantage they had at first over their Enemies, and had forbore to plunder 'till they had been assur'd of the Victory, it had not declar'd so soon for Alexius ; who, during the Confusion the unseasonable Avarice of those Barbarians had created, seiz'd on Bryennius his State-Horse, adorn'd as it was with the Imperial Ornaments, according to the Custom of those Times ; and having order'd it to be led up and down the Army, proclaim'd aloud that the General was slain.

By this Device Alexius fix'd the Fortune of the Day ; for on the one Hand it added fresh Vigour to the Imperial Troops, and quite dispirited those of Bryennius on the other ; and it was impossible for him to convince them of the Error, into which they had been betray'd, 'till 'twas too late ; wherefore finding himself irrecoverably lost, he at length fled after the rest, and was taken in the Pursuit, having

against whom the Emperor
sends Alexius.

who takes him Prisoner.

first

first giving extraordinary Proofs of his Personal Valour. Alexius receiv'd him with a Respect and Commiseration due to his Person and Misfortunes. Having settled his Forces in Quarters of Refreshment, he set forward with this unhappy Prisoner to Constantinople, but before he could reach the Imperial City, Borilus, the great Favourite of Botoniates, met him with Orders from the Emperor, in whose Name he requir'd Bryennius to be deliver'd up to him, and gave him a Commission to march back against Basilacius, who began to appear as dangerous to the Empire as Bryennius had been before him.

Basilacius
Usurps.

Basilacius was a Person remarkable for the Strength of his Body, and great Presence of Mind, which made him bold, and capable of the most hazardous Undertakings. Being naturally proud and ambitious, he had been long designing what he now thought fit to put in Execution; like the Heir of Bryennius his Courage, as he prov'd afterwards of his Misfortunes, he prevail'd with the Men of Interest in the West to declare for him, and at the Head of a considerable Number of Veteran Soldiers, and the Boors of the Country, who were join'd by those that had escap'd the late Defeat, he set out from Dyrrachium to Thessalonica, which he easily took, and having been declar'd Emperor in his March, he there began to exercise his Imperial Authority.

In the mean time Alexius, having drawn his Troops out of their Quarters, march'd into Thessaly, and perceiving how much Basilacius was superior to him in Force, he encamp'd himself very advantageously between two Rivers, prepar'd to prevent any Surprize, and vigilant to lay hold of all Advantages. Basilacius lay encamp'd very near him, and knowing the Caution of his Adversary, and how difficult it would be to bring him to an Engagement, he resolv'd to fall on his Camp by Night. Of this Alexius being apprehensive, either from his own natural Sagacity, or the Information of Deserters, gave Orders for all to be ready by

by the Evening ; and having commanded the usual Fires to be kindled throughout the Camp, and his own Tent to be illuminated with Lamps, as soon as Night approach'd he march'd out with his Forces without the least Noise, and posted himself at a convenient distance behind his Camp, expecting the Issue of his Stratagem. Basilacius, on the other side, having prepar'd his Men for that purpose, waited for the Opportunity he promis'd himself from the Darkness of the Night, and then broke with great Violence into Alexius his Camp ; where, whilst his Forces were dispers'd to kill their Enemies, whom they thought to find asleep, he himself prepar'd to surprize their General in his Tent, whither he march'd with full confidence ; but was hardly sensible of his Error, and the Danger he had thrust himself into, before Alexius return'd in a regular Order, and fell suddenly upon those, who, thinking their Enemies fled, were in a disorderly manner intent upon the Spoil, and unprepar'd at first to make any Resistance. Basilacius, beside the Disappointment of his Prey, found now upon what great Disadvantages he was to contend ; however he reduc'd his Forces into the best Order he was able, and made good his Defence all that Night, and some part of the Day following ; but at length his Men, who were forc'd to fight upon unequal Terms, began to give Ground, and perceiving Manuel, Basilacius his Brother, was taken, they fled with great Precipitation, and threw themselves with their General into Thessalonica, whither Alexius closely pursu'd 'em, and immediately summon'd the City ; and because he was willing to get Basilacius alive, if possible, into his Custody, he promis'd Security to his Person, and his Interest with the Emperor for an Indemnity for what was past, provided he would submit and surrender himself.

but is defeated by Alexius.

Basilacius was so far from accepting of these advantageous Conditions, that he prepar'd to hold out to the last Extremity ; but the Inhabitants, who were afraid

and taken Prisoner.

A. D.
1080.

afraid lest Alexius should demolish their Town, open'd their Gates, allowing Basilacius just time enough to retire into the Castle, whither he carry'd with him the same invincible Spirit, before the Victorious General was receiv'd into the City. Here Alexius once more made Offers of an Accommodation to Basilacius, who with an unshaken Constancy once more rejected 'em, chusing rather to fall like a Soldier with his Sword in his Hand, than submit to his Enemies; 'till the Soldiers, who were to defend the Castle, terrify'd at Alexius his Success, laid violent Hands upon him, and deliver'd him up to the Roman General; who, together with his Prisoner, sent an Account of his Victory to the Emperor, who commanded Basilacius his Eyes to be pluck'd out, and dignify'd Alexius with the Title of Sebastos, or Augustus.

By these Services Alexius render'd himself considerable in the Empire, and made way for his future Advancement, which he shortly after effected. In this he was faithfully assisted by his Brother Isaac, and under-hand by Mary the Empress, at first the Wife of Michael Ducas, and afterwards of his Successor Nicephorus Botoniates. Nicephorus, being an easie, improvident, and unactive Prince, suffer'd himself to be govern'd by Borilus and Germanus, two Scythian Brothers, who, well acquainted with the Arts of the Court, reign'd there with an invidious Authority; when they perceiv'd that Botoniates was too much declin'd in Years to hope for any Issue of his own, they advis'd him to think of a Successor; and he, tho' Constantinus Ducas, Son of the late Emperor, and his own Son-in-Law, had an undisputed Right to succeed him, yet, after some Consultation with his two Favourites, he declar'd privately in Favour of Synademus, a Youth related to him, of Illustrious Parentage, great Beauty, and of other Qualities uncommon to one of his Years. This Designation was not manag'd with so great Secrecy, but the Empress had Intimation of it, and being highly concern'd at the Injury she thought they were doing her Son, she discover'd all to Isaac and Alexius Comnenus. Isaac had lately marry'd one of her near Relations, and Alexius was so powerful in the Army, and had been just then adopted by her, that she was easily persuaded, both by Affinity and Interest, to apply to them ; and they, being naturally Ambitious, and by Birth laying a Claim to the Empire, strove to strengthen her Resentments, and promis'd her all imaginable Assistance.

were

The Intimacy that daily appear'd betwixt the Empress and the Comneni, administer'd just Grounds of Jealousie to the two Favourites, who therefore at first endeavour'd to render 'em suspected to the Emperor, and when they found that could not be effected, they prepar'd by some violent Means to remove 'em. Of this Alexius receiv'd a seasonable Information, some say by means of the vigilant Empress her self, so that having first inform'd his Mother and Relations of the Danger they were in, he apply'd himself to Pacurianus, a Principal Officer in the Army, the smallness of whose Stature was abundantly made good by the largeness of his Soul, his Experience in the Wars, and Illustrious Birth. Pacurianus being inform'd by Alexius of the two Brother's Designs, without any Hesitation return'd him this resolute Answer, If early the next Morning you will withdraw to the Army, behold here the faithful Companion of your Flight and Fortunes ; but if you delay a Moment longer, I will instantly discover all to the Emperor, and inform him of the Treasonable Proposals you have made me. Alexius, charm'd with so generous a Proceeding, came immediately to this Agreement with him, which was confirm'd by Oath, That when ever the one should be advanc'd to the Imperial Dignity, the other should succeed him in all his Employments.

Alexius being in Danger prepares for a Revolt.

This being done to their mutual Satisfaction, Alexius, Isaacius, Pacurianus, and the rest of their Adherents, fled early in the Morning towards the Army lying then upon the Borders in Thrace, from whence whence they sent a Messenger to John, the Brother of the late Emperor Constantinus Ducas, living then in those Parts, with Invitations to partake of the Entertainments, as they term'd it, which they had been preparing. John at first receiv'd the Messenger with much Consternation ; on the one Hand he was afraid of the Emperor's Resentment, (who had already entertain'd a Jealousie of him) should the Conspirators miscarry ; on the other he apprehended the Power of the Comneni, who were Masters of all the Forces quarter'd in that Country, and were able to punish him upon a Refusal ; to this Consideration he added another of no less weight, the general Dissatisfaction of the People upon the great Progress of the Turks, who prevail'd in all Parts, and had lately taken the City of Cyzicus, which made 'em prone to any Innovations. Hereupon he chearfully embrac'd the Proposals, and ordering his numerous Retinue to be got ready, he set forward on his Journey, and on his way intercepted an Officer, who was going with a great Treasure, part of the Emperor's Revenue, to Constantinople, which he seiz'd, and by so unexpected a Supply, render'd his Appearance more welcome to the Comneni.

Alexius
Comne-
nus.

Immediately upon his Arrival the Chief Officers of the Army consulted what was next to be done, and after some Consideration whether Isaacius, or Alexius should be declar'd Emperor, it was unanimously decreed in favour of the latter, as well at the Instigation of Isaacius himself, as by the Advice and earnest Exhortations of John Ducas, and all his powerful Relations, who were the more inclinable to him because Alexius had marry'd Irene, one of their Family. Accordingly Alexius was declar'd, and saluted Emperor by all the Army, which he led, by long Marches, towards Constantinople, receiving the Acclamations and Acknowledgments of all the Cities as he pass'd.

Nicephorus

Nicephorus receiv'd the News of his Approach with the utmost Consternation; his Age had robb'd him of that Strength and Activity for which he had heretofore been deservedly renown'd, and his present Dangers had render'd him incapable of safe and wholesome Councils. The Citizens in general were disaffected, the Senate irresolute, and tho' his two Favourites, and some others continu'd faithful to him, yet they seem'd rather resolv'd to Fall with him, than capable of Protecting him. The Sense of his own Usurpation added a weight to his present Confusion, and the Wrong he had done others taught him what he was to expect himself.

Whilst he lay under these Apprehensions Alexius approach'd the Imperial City, to which he thought not fit to lay a regular Siege, but by slight Skirmishes, and momentary Attempts, try the Temper and Inclinations of the Inhabitants; chusing rather, if possible, to have it betray'd into his Hands, than by the Obstinacy of a Siege to force it. In this he was very happily assisted by George Palæologus, a Person of Principal Authority in the Empire, who at first was with great Difficulty persuaded to espouse the Interest of the Comneni; but having once embrac'd it he appear'd a very zealous Champion for them, tho' his Father continu'd firm in his Obedience to Botoniates. This Man enter'd into a Treaty with him, who had one of the Quarters of the City committed to his Charge, and he promis'd to open the Gates at the same time that Palæologus, who got secretly into the Town, was to give Alexius a Signal from the Turret, that he might march and take Possession of them. This Design was executed with a Success suitable to the Secrecy with which it was concerted; and the Comneni were Masters of the City before Botoniates knew it was assaulted. Alexius his Army, being compos'd of Barbarians as well as Christians, 'tis incredible to relate the Mischief they did in that rich and populous City, which they plunder'd with an unheard of Brutality, without out any regard had to things Sacred, robbing the Churches as well as Shops, prophaning Cloysters, and unripping Houses with an equal Impetuosity.

Palæologus, having thus gain'd Admission for Alexius his Troops into the City, so dexterously manag'd the Officers of the Fleet then riding in the Haven, that they all declar'd for the new Emperor; and Botoniates sent to offer a Submission to Alexius, to whom he propos'd wholly to resign the Power of Emperor, provided he might be suffer'd to share the Name with him, and reserve some of the outward Ornaments of the Imperial Dignity. To this the Comneni are said to have assented, but were with great Obstinacy oppos'd in it by John Ducas, who, discovering his implacable Hatred to Botoniates, upon the Account of his Nephew Michael, would suffer Alexius to listen to no Accommodation. In the mean time Borilus, observing with how much Security Alexius his Soldiers rang'd throughout the City, drew together a good Body of Forces well arm'd, and of approv'd Fidelity, with which he offer'd Botoniates to fall upon the unthinking Enemy, and promis'd to give him a good Account of his Undertaking. This Offer was thankfully receiv'd by the disconsolate Emperor, but Cosma the Patriarch happening to be present, and dreading the Effusion of Blood, from which, after the first Impression, Alexius his Soldiers had hitherto abstain'd, advis'd him at length to submit to the Divine Will, and retire to a private Life, rather than by his Obstinacy suffer the City to be polluted with the Slaughter of Christians wallowing in each others Blood. Botoniates was so lively touch'd with this Heavenly Exhortation, that he immediately retir'd out of the Imperial Palace, and fled for Refuge to the Great Church; where with much Difficulty, he was persuaded to be shaven, and to turn Monk, after a Reign of almost three Years, during which he did nothing answerable to the Expectation Men had conceiv'd of him before his Advancement, but left the Empire in and Depo-

ses Botoni-
ates.

a worse Condition than that wherein he found it, suffering the Turks to gain Ground every Day in Asia, without undertaking any thing effectually to restrain 'em. His great Favourite Borilus made it appear in the end how much he lov'd the Authority, and how little he esteem'd the Person of his great Master and Benefactor; for when he found that the Patriarch's Admonitions had prevail'd, contrary to his Advice and Expectation, and that the confus'd Emperor had forgot to divest himself of the Imperial Gown before he quitted the Palace to retire to the Church, he violently tore off the Jewels that were fasten'd to the Sleeve, adding, with an insolent Reproach, that an Habit, depriv'd of all Ornaments, best became the Condition he had with such a poorness of Spirit embrac'd. After Botoniates had been for some time in the Cloyster, he was ask'd by one of his intimate Friends, With what Temper of Mind he bore that Change of Condition? To whom he reply'd, That he found nothing unpleasant in his present State of Life, but his enjoin'd Abstinence from Flesh; an uncommon Answer to an obvious Question.

C H A P. IV.

From the Beginning of Alexius his Reign, 'till the Western Christians expell'd the Greeks out of Constantinople.

Containing the Space of 119 Years.

I. IF Alexius had consider'd the unhappy Conclusion of the late Reigns, he would have had small reason to have coveted his Advancement; but Ambition, like a vicious Glass, represents things in their wrong Colours, and makes some Men fond of the Imperial Purple, tho' in the end proves as pernicious as Hercules his Shirt. The greatest and best Pretence to Power is a larger Opportunity of doing good, tho' in the mean time a Man has as full a Scope for the Exercise of his Virtues in a Cell, as upon a Throne, and that Water which flows from a polluted Fountain, how clear soever it may appear, must be dangerous and unwholesome. However Usurpations were, by this time, grown so familiar to the Constantinopolitans, that he only was judg'd to have a Legal Right, who had the longest Sword; and Succession was so far from being observ'd among 'em, that Possession it self was an unregarded Plea, unless supported by the Force of Arms; than which nothing can be more pernicious to the Safety of a State, or more apparently threaten the Dissolution of it.

A. D. 1081. Alexius, having thus master'd the City of Constantinople, was immediately, upon Botoniates his Resignation, crown'd by the Hands of the Patriarch, in the Month of April, in the fourth Indiction, An. Dom. 1081. after which he took care, in the best manner he could, to reward those who had been instrumental in his Promotion; but found himself so unable to answer all their Deserts, or Expectations, that he was oblig'd oblig'd to invent new Honours and Dignities to gratifie them. Constantinus Ducas, the Son of the late Emperor Michael, was honour'd with a Shadow of the Imperial Dignity; he was suffer'd to wear an Imperial Crown, and make use of the other Ornaments inseparable to that Dignity. He sign'd with Alexius in all Acts and Grants, was saluted with him in all publick Acclamations, and follow'd immediately after him in the general Proceffions. A Promise of this his Mother Mary, the late Empress, is said to have obtain'd from the Comneni before they undertook to declare against Botoniates, which was now confirm'd by a Golden Bull at the Instigation of John Ducas, who thought it the only Means to persuade Mary to quit the Imperial Palace, from whence he was desirous to remove her, either out of an inveterate Aversion to her Person, or a Distrust lest she should give Occasion to some new Commotions; for she was a Princess belov'd by the People, and of so exquisite a Beauty, that tho' she was something past the Prime of her Years, it was thought no impossible thing for her to ensnare one of the Comneni. However, having thus provided for the Honour and Safety of her Son, she withdrew to Mangana, and contented her self with a private Life. After this Alexius proceeded to reward his Brother, and the rest of his Relations, which he did with so liberal a Hand, that he thereby impoverish'd his Treasury, which threw him upon unjust exactions and illegal Usurpations, the unhappy Effects of which he severely felt afterwards. When this was done, knowing how much the late barbarous Behaviour of his Soldiers in the City had offended the Clergy and the People, he thought the only way left to reconcile himself to 'em, was to make a publick Confession, and undergo a publick Penance; which he did with more Art and Design, as some affirm, than Humility and Devotion: For having made an open Acknowledgment of his Rebellion, and the great Damage the Imperial City sustain'd, as a Consequence of it, the Patriarch enjoin'd him, and all those who had assisted him in the Defection, a Penance for forty Days, during which they were to fast, and sleep on the Ground, in the performance of which none appear'd so chearful as the Emperor.

Alexius
his Actions
against the
Turks,

Having, as he thought, by these Rewards and Expiations settled the Minds of his People at home, he began to observe the growing Power of the Turks, whose Sultan Solyman had, during the Distractions of the late Reigns, fix'd his Court at Nice, and from thence made daily Incursions up as far as the Bosphorus, roving without Control upon the Sea-Coasts, and always returning loaden with Booty. To prevent this, the Emperor order'd sufficient Numbers of his Forces to embark on board light Pinaces design'd for that purpose, who coasting along the Shoar by Night, where-ever they found the Turks not exceeding them in Numbers, landed on a sudden, and fell violently upon 'em; and having done sufficient Execution, they as suddenly reembark'd, and prepar'd for the like Onset upon some other Post, which they attempted with an equal Success. This they continu'd so long, and harra'ss'd the Enemy to that Degree, that they were forc'd to quit their Stations upon the Shoar, and remove farther up into the Country; whither the Romans follow'd 'em, seiz'd the Posts they had deserted, from whence they tir'd 'em by their frequent Alarms, and so gaul'd 'em by their sudden and unexpected Assaults, still deluding 'em with as quick a Retreat, that the Sultan, who had lost many of his Subjects in this tumultuary War, thought it adviseable to sue for Peace.

who conclude a Peace with
him.

Though Alexius was sensible of the Necessities to which he had reduc'd the Turks, and how easie it was for him to pursue his present Advantages, yet he readily listen'd to the Overtures made him by Solyman's Ambassadors, who thereupon concluded a Peace between him and the Sultan.

It has been truly observ'd, that the Turks ow'd the Extent of their Dominions, which in time cover'd so great a Part of the Earth, rather to the unhappy Dissensions among Christians, than the Courage or Discipline of their own Forces, of which the History before us affords an undeniable Instance. For whilst Alexius was managing the War against the Turks with so much Conduct and Success, he was diverted from the Prosecution of it, upon Advice of the Preparations Robert Guiscard, Duke of Pavia and Calabria, was making against him in the West; which made him think rather of securing what still remain'd of the Empire to his Successors, than recovering those Parts as had been wrested from his Predecessors.

This Expedition of Robert giving ground to several of Alexius's Actions in the Series of his Reign, it will not be improper to make a particular Enquiry into the Reasons for it. Robert was by Birth a Norman, the Son of Tancred, Lord of Hauteville; who having a numerous Family, and but a small Estate, sent his two Eldest Sons, about the Beginning of the eleventh Century, to try their Fortune in the Wars against the Saracens in Italy, where they behav'd themselves with great Courage and Success, and taking an Occasion to be their own Paymasters, they seiz'd on certain Places in Pavia, and sending for their Brethren, they in time establish'd their Dominion in Italy. Robert, the third Son, as he surviv'd most of his Brethren, so he prov'd the most fortunate. He, not content with Pavia, conquer'd the greatest Part of that Country which is now call'd the Kingdom of Naples, and took upon himself the Title of Duke of Pavia and Calabria, which he enjoy'd many Years without a Competitor. Being a Prince of an aspiring ambitious Temper, he persuaded the Emperor Michael Parapinaces to betroth his young Son Constantinus Ducas to his Daughter, which Michael, who saw how much he stood in need of Foreign Assistance, readily consented to; and having made his Escape into the West, towards the

Robert Guiscard his Expedition against Alexius.

the End of Botoniates his Reign, he earnestly solicited Robert and the Pope for his Restoration, which Robert very readily undertook. This is the Account left us by the Latin Writers, from whom the Greeks differ only in this, that it was not Michael himself who implor'd Robert's Assistance, but a Monk call'd Ræctor, suborn'd by Robert to personate that unhappy Prince, and thereby give a better Colour to his Undertaking.

Alexius, upon the first Advice of Robert's Motion's dispatch'd away George Palæologus to secure the City of Dyrrachium, and other Posts in those Parts; the Governors of which having not as yet sworn Allegiance to him, gave him great Reason to suspect they would with the first Opportunity revolt to his Enemy. At the same time he endeavour'd, by rich Presents and large Promises, to stir up the Western Princes against Robert, especially Henry the German Emperor, with whom he offer'd to enter into the strictest Alliances, nor did he omit to make such Provision at home as the Danger with which he was threaten'd indispensibly requir'd. He sent for all the Forces quarter'd in the East, except some few left for the Security of the Borders, and commanded the general Officers to make new Levies as they march'd along. By frequent Musters, and large Donatives, he confirm'd the Minds of his Soldiers, and in every respect behav'd himself like a Prince who was sensible of the Power with which he was to contend, and the Dangers that naturally arise from Foreign Invasions.

In the mean time Robert, having left his Son Roger as his Lieutenant in Italy, set sail with all his Forces from Brundusium, and landed at Buthrotum or Butrinto in Epirus, where he was join'd by his Son Bohemond, who having first landed at Aulon, a Sea-port Town in Albania, took it at the first Assault. Here Robert divided his Forces into two Bodies, with one of which he intended to proceed by Sea to Dyrrachium, whilst his Son march'd towards it by Land at the Head of the

the other, resolving at once to besiege it by Land and Water. But Robert was hardly put out to Sea before he was overtaken with a furious Storm, which separated his Fleet, destroy'd several of his Ships, and suffer'd himself with great Difficulty to escape ashore; where reflecting on the Numbers of Men he had lost, he allow'd those that surviv'd seven Days time to refresh themselves, at a Place call'd Glabinitza, where that Body which his Son commanded came up to him, and some Troops that he had left behind at Brundisium and other Ports join'd him: So that being as he thought sufficiently reinforc'd, he sat down before Dyrrachium on the fourteenth of June, at the same time ordering his Fleet to approach it by Sea, being resolv'd to take it at what Price soever, as a Pledge of his future Conquests.

*He besieges
Dyrrachi-
um,*

The Inhabitants of Dyrrachium were so terrify'd at the Approach of this Army, that 'tis very likely they had open'd the Gates to Robert at the first Summons, had they not been restrain'd by the great Courage and Authority of Palæologus, whose indefatigable Vigilance omitted nothing requisite to a vigorous Defence, or worthy the Trust the Emperor had repos'd in him; above all he took Care to inform Alexius of Robert's Arrival, and the great Consternation the Country was in. The Emperor having agreed with Solyman for some Auxiliary Turks, after several Treaties with the Venetians, they undertook to fall on Robert by Sea, and defend Dyrrachium on that side. Accordingly they set sail with a numerous well-appointed Navy, with whom Robert's Son Bohemond engaging receiv'd an absolute Defeat, his own Ship and several others were sunk, and he himself narrowly escap'd. The Venetians having thus broken the Fleet landed on a sudden, and being join'd by Palæologus from the Town, they fell furiously upon Robert's Men, whom they drove to their Tents, and then return'd to their Ships with a great Booty.

Nor was this the only Difficulty Robert had to contend with during this memorable Siege, for the Venetians having shortly after that given him a second Defeat, grew so powerful at Sea, that his Ships could not ride there in any manner of safety, so that he was oblig'd to draw 'em ashore for their better Security. This threw him into a greater Inconvenience than any he had suffer'd before, for the Inhabitants of the Seaport Towns, seeing him no longer Master at Sea, refus'd him their usual Contributions; and he being unable to receive any Provisions out of Italy, a great Famine rag'd in his Camp, which was succeeded by a Pestilential Disease occasion'd by the Change of Air, which is said to have destroy'd upwards of ten thousand in three Months time; it rag'd particularly amongst his Horse, the very Flower of his Army, and carry'd off most of his Chief Officers and prime Nobility: So that had he not been a Prince of an unshaken Constancy, he never would have persisted in the Pursuit of an Enterprize, whose Beginning seem'd to discourage him with so many fatal Disappointments.

However, finding by Experience how necessary it was for him to have the Sea open, he once more with great Difficulty launch'd his Ships, and apply'd himself with new Vigour to the Prosecution of the Siege. And the Emperor, finding by repeated Advices how hardly the Besieg'd were press'd, having left his Brother Isaac at Constantinople, to observe the Temper of the People, and restrain such as should be found to attempt any Innovations, he set forward to Thessalonica, where he was join'd by Pacurianus and the Forces under his Command; and having receiv'd fresh Advices from Palæologus, urging him to a timely Relief, he immediately march'd towards Dyrrachium, and encamp'd on a rising Ground at some Distance from the Town, having the Sea on the Left, and a very high Mountain on the Right. Here he entrench'd himself, and held a Council of War, at which Palæologus was summon'd to assist; and after a serious Debate it was resolv'd resolv'd to fight the Enemy, contrary to the Advice of the Eldest and most Experienc'd Commanders in the Army, and Alexius gave the necessary Orders accordingly. Robert on his side was so far from being terrify'd at the Emperor's Presence, and his Preparations for an Engagement, that he commanded his Men to sink their Ships, and burn their Camp-Equipage, giving 'em thereby to understand there was no Medium left between Death and Conquest, that one would free 'em from the Want of what they were now destroying, and the other supply 'em abundantly with all things from their Enemies. At first the Emperor's Forces had the Advantage, and drove a Body of Robert's Troops towards the Sea, which put the whole Army into some Disorder; but they being again restor'd by the Masculine Behaviour of Gaita, Robert's Wife, and the Pallas of her Age, they fell with so much Violence upon those who just before seem'd to have so great an Advantage over them, that they fled with great Precipitation to a Church dedicated to St. Michael, which stood not far from the Place of Battel, whither they were pursu'd by the victorious Latins, who set Fire to the Sacred Pile, and destroy'd both that and their Enemies. By this time Robert, defeats the whose Courage and Conduct were equally to be ad- Emperor. mir'd upon that Occasion, made an Impression upon the main Body of the Roman Army, which after a short but hot Dispute was defeated and put to Flight. Alexius had in all likelihood maintain'd the Field longer than he did, had it not been for the Auxiliary Turks, who kept themselves entire and unbroken during the Heat of the Engagement, but as soon as they found the Victory enclining to the Latins, they suddenly drew off and march'd back towards their own Country, which added to the Confusion the Romans were already in, and confirm'd their Overthrow.

Alexius his Loss was not more considerable for the Numbers than the Quality of the slain, among whom were Constantius the Son of Constantinus Ducas, Nicephorus

and takes the Town;

which reduces Alexius to great Necessities.

phorus Synademos, and Nicephorus Palæologus, the Father of George, with several others of the Prime Nobility. The Emperor himself was one of the last that turn'd his Back, and therefore escap'd with the greater Difficulty to Achris; of which when Robert was inform'd, he grew so incens'd against those he had sent to pursue him, that he order'd one of 'em to run the Gantlet, and gave the rest signal Marks of his Displeasure, so sure he thought himself of the Emperor's Person, which would have compleated a Victory of it self so very considerable; for it had made him Master of the Emperor's Pavilion, the Roman Camp and all their Baggage; and shortly after of Dyrrachium, which was surrender'd up to him at his next Summons. Here he spent some time in the Refreshment of his Troops, in the Recovery of the wounded, and the rewarding those who had behav'd themselves well in the Engagement.

Tho' a Wound the Emperor had receiv'd in his Forehead was exceeding troublesome, yet that of his Mind was more insupportable; his Army was so weaken'd that he found it impossible to take the Field again without new Levies; and his own improvident Liberality, and the Profuseness of the late Emperor Botoniates, had so impoverish'd the Treasury, that those Levies could not be rais'd without a seeming Miracle: So that the Roman Empire lay under two Difficulties, at that time especially the most dangerous, Weakness and Poverty. In this Extremity, the Emperor thought once of quitting the Purple, which he found encumber'd with so many Cares; but receiving fresh Incouragement from his Mother and the rest of the Comneni, who sent all their Plate to the Mint, and having seiz'd on great Quantities of that which belong'd to the Church, to the great Scandal of his Clergy, he prepar'd for fresh Recruits, and to draw some of his Neighbours into his Quarrel, especially Henry the German Emperor, whom he perswaded to invade Robert's Territories, hoping such a Diversion would would give him some time to breathe, and enable him in the End to drive him out of Illyricum. Accordingly Henry, pursuant to the Agreement between 'em, mov'd with his Army towards Italy; of which when Robert was inform'd, being sensible of the Danger to which his Dominions would be expos'd, should they be invaded during his Absence, he instantly summon'd a Council of War, where having declar'd his Son Bohemond to command as his Lieutenant in the East, and recommended him to the general Officers of the Army, he departed for Italy; and having reliev'd the Pope, who was closely besieg'd by the Imperialists in the Castle of St. Angelo, he constrain'd Henry to quit Italy, and retook Rome from the Schismatics; after which he retir'd to Salernum, there to refresh himself, and expect the Event of Bohemond's Arms in the East, where he successfully push'd on the War against Alexius: For as soon as his Father was departed he muster'd his Forces, which he found considerably strengthen'd by the Accession of several Romans, who, dishearten'd at the late Defeat, had deserted the Emperor and declar'd for the Victor; after which he took in several Towns and Places of Consequence, which he had time to fortifie before the Emperor was able to move to their Assistance. At length Alexius, perceiving he had only chang'd the General, and not remov'd the War, march'd from Constantinople at the Head of such Forces as he had been able to draw together, and was readily offer'd Battel by Bohemond, who once more overthrew him, and chas'd him a second time to Achris; where having again recruited his Army, he was yet a third time overthrown and forc'd to fly, and implore the Assistance of Solyman the Turk, who sent him seven thousand of his Veteran Troops, under the Command of his most experienc'd Officers.

In the mean time Bohemond, having taken in several of the most considerable Towns in Thessaly, was late down before Laressa, which was defended for six Months

Alexius's
Artifice.

Months together by Leo Cephalas, who thereby gave Alexius time to march up to its Relief ; and he having been so often defeated by the Latins, who were always superior to him in Horse, he endeavour'd, according to his Method formerly, to obtain that by Stratagem which he had in vain attempted by open Force. In this he succeeded so well, that having drawn the Latins into an Ambuscade, he cut off great Numbers of 'em, and took their Camp ; and tho' in the end Bohemond seem'd to have the better of the Day, yet Alexius tamper'd so effectually with his chief Officers, that he was forc'd shortly after to retire to his Father into Italy, either for fresh Forces to recruit his Army, or Money to pay 'em, they refusing to continue the War 'till they had receiv'd their Arrears.

A. D.
1083.

Alexius, making use of Bohemond's Absence, recover'd several Towns that the Fortune of the War had wrested from him ; and hearing what great Preparations Robert was forming against him, he once more crav'd the Aid of the Venetians his Confederates, to which they readily accorded, and mann'd out a powerful Fleet for his Assistance ; which, being join'd to the Emperor's, overthrew Robert in two Engagements, but were shortly after surpriz'd by him, as they lay secure in the Confidence of their own Strength, and Contempt of his Forces, and receiv'd an absolute Defeat, which he us'd with the greatest Barbarity, depriving some of those he took Prisoners of their Eyes, others of their Hands and Feet, and putting others to unheard of Torments ; at which the Venetians were so provok'd, that they shortly after rigg'd out another Fleet, and fell on Robert as he lay at Anchor near Buthrinto, burnt or sunk most of his Ships, and had like to have taken his Wife and younger Son Prisoners ; notwithstanding which he prepar'd with an invincible Courage to resist his Fleet, and revenge himself upon his Enemies, but dy'd of a Fever in the Island of Cephalenia, in the twenty sixth Year of his Establishment of the Normans in Italy, and the seventy

Robert
dies.

seventy ninth of his Age; after whose Death Dyrrachium, and the other Towns in those Parts, return'd to the Emperor.

Alexius being, by the Death of Robert, deliver'd from a dangerous and expensive War, found himself at leisure to observe the Proceedings of the Turks, whose Intestine Divisions seem'd to offer him some fair Advantages against 'em, which proceeded no farther than to the Recovery of a few Maritime Towns, and some Advantages over Apelchafemus, the pretended Sultan of Nice, which Place the Emperor in vain desir'd, and attempted to get into his Hands; for he was at the same time clogg'd with the Resentments of his Clergy, who being upon good Grounds offended at him for his Invading the Goods of the Church, gave him a sufficient Trouble, which was not well compos'd before a War broke out with the Scythians, who threaten'd the Empire with new Dan- The Scythian War. gers; for having pass'd the Danube, and being invited into the Roman Territories by the discontented Manichees, they did great Mischief where-ever they came. Against these the Emperor sent Pacurianus, who being join'd in Commission afterwards with Branas, a valiant, but hot-headed, unthinking Officer, was forc'd to fight with unequal Numbers contrary to his own Judgment, and was kill'd in the Action, together with his unhappy Colleague, to the exceeding great Grief of the Emperor, who had a most particular Esteem for Pacurianus upon the account of his consummate Experience, and approv'd Fidelity. However he immediately appointed Talicius, or Talin, who had lately commanded with Success against the Turks, to succeed him in the Service. Talicius engag'd 'em near Philippopolis, and having slain a great Number of 'em in the Battel put the rest to Flight, concluding, tho' his Victory seem'd entire, the Service was not yet over, but that fresh Supplies, which he knew the Barbarians could not long want, would quickly draw him to a second Engagement. Accordingly he was

Q

shortly

shortly after inform'd by his Scouts, that the Scythians were approaching with redoubled Forces; whereupon he drew up his Men in Order of Battel, and stood prepar'd to receive 'em: Tho' the Scythians, by their Approach, seem'd desirous of an Engagement, and the Romans appear'd ready to give 'em Battel; yet after they had both view'd each other for two Days together, the Scythians retir'd with so much Order and Expedition, that the Romans, who were far inferior to 'em in Numbers of Men, found it in vain to pursue 'em.

The Scythians the Spring following renew'd their Incursions, and grew in time so considerable, that the Emperor thought it proper to march against 'em in Person. Accordingly he remov'd from the Imperial City to Adrianople, and from thence to a Place call'd Lardea, where, having muster'd his Forces, he prepar'd to engage, contrary to the Advice of his most experienc'd Captains, especially of Bryennius before-mention'd, who tho' he had lost his Eyes by Order from Botoniates, as had been before observ'd, was still highly esteem'd for his extraordinary Knowledge and Affection to the present Emperor. But Alexius being guided more by his own Inclinations, and the Heat of the younger Officers, resolv'd to fight; and tho' the Victory for some time seem'd to incline to the Romans, whose Commanders are said to have done Wonders upon that Occasion, yet the Scythians, being by much superior in Numbers, at length turn'd the Fortune of the Day, and put the Romans to flight, in which many were slain, and the Emperor himself escap'd with great Difficulty to Berce, where he receiv'd a surprizing Account of the great Numbers the Scythians had taken Captive, all which were however shortly after redeem'd. After this a Peace was frequently concluded, and as often broken by the irreconcilable Scythians, to the great Danger and apparent Ruin of the Empire. For the Turks observing the main Forces of the Empire were, in a great Measure, directed against those Barbarians, who however continu'd unconquer'd, seiz'd suddenly on Clazomene, Phocæa, Metylene, and Methymna, Places of considerable Importance in Asia, and afterwards the Island of Chios, which tho' the Romans attempted to recover, yet were they in the end forc'd to raise the Siege, and had like to have lost their Fleet. This oblig'd the Emperor to draw some of his Forces out of the West, and to send 'em under the Conduct of John Ducas, Brother to the Empress, against the prevailing Turks, who threaten'd otherwise to bear all before them; whilst he, in the mean time, pursu'd the War against the Scythians in Person, which was prolong'd partly by the Obstinacy of his declar'd Enemies, but more through the Treachery of his pretended Friends. Among these was Neantzès, a Scythian by Nation, who deserted to the Emperor almost at the beginning of the War, and express'd himself, upon Occasions, full of Duty and Respect, but took care to betray all the Emperor's Designs to his Countrymen; of which when he was accus'd by one, who, being of a mix'd Birth, understood both Languages, and heard Neantzès entertaining a traiterous Conference with the Barbarian Commanders, instead of vindicating himself to Alexius, and confuting his Accuser, he drew his Scymiter in the Emperor's Presence, and at the Head of the Army slew the Informer, which was so far from removing the Suspicion of the Crimes objected to him, that it gave great Credit to the Information. However, both Armies being ready to engage, the Emperor thought fit to defer a farther Enquiry 'till the Battel was over, and by that means gave him an Opportunity of Deserting at the first Charge, and of discovering to his Countrymen the Disposition of the Roman Forces, which occasion'd their Defeat.
in

This Disgrace was wiped out by a considerable Advantage over the Barbarians obtain'd shortly after, which however did not hinder 'em from renewing

A great Victory obtain'd against the Scythians.

their Attempts the Spring following, when with fresh Forces they assaulted the Empire. But now Fortune seem'd determin'd against 'em, for the Romans overthrew 'em in two Engagements with little or no Loss to themselves; and tho' they had afterwards the Confidence to make their Excursions almost as far as the Walls of Constantinople it self, and gave the Emperor great Reason to apprehend the Turks would become Confederates with them in the War, yet at length their frequent Advantages and barbarous Confidence had so effectually blinded 'em, that Alexius watch'd his Opportunity, and in a pitch'd Battel did such Execution upon 'em that few escap'd; they who did not fall in the Fight, were murder'd in cold Blood, the Women and Children sharing in the same Fate with their adventurous Husbands and Fathers.

Alexius
his Wars
with the Turks.

This Victory, which may be allow'd to be the most compleat Alexius ever obtain'd, put an End to the War; after which the Emperor spent some time in settling the Affairs of the Provinces in the West, and then prepar'd to manage the War in Person against the Turks, which had hitherto been conducted with various Success by the Care of John Ducas, his Brother-in-Law. The Great Leader of the Turks was call'd Tzachas, who heing possess'd of the City of Smyrna, began there to exercise a Regal Authority independent of the Sultan or the Emperor, and by degrees became so powerful, that he struck a Terror into the Inhabitants of Constantinople it self: Wherefore Alexius, as we observ'd before, sent John Ducas, his Commander in Chief, to oppose him, and with him Constantinus Delassenus, who had a Command of the Fleet subordinate to the other, who was to assault Metylene, and such other Places as he lately wrested from the Empire by Sea, whilst John attack'd it by Land. In the mean time Tzachas had committed Metylene to the Custody of his Brother, whilst he with a select Army kept abroad, watching the Motions of his Enemies, and intent upon all Occasions

casions to support and succour his Friends; and Ducas acted with so much Vigour against him, that almost every Day, for three Months together, the Romans were either employ'd against the Walls of Metylene, or engag'd with Tzachas, by which continu'd Services they grew so exceeding weak, that without some timely Reinforcements, they were in danger of being all cut off. Of this when Alexius was inform'd, and that the Fight generally began in the Morning, at which time the Romans fought with the Sun constantly in their Faces, he sent Orders to John to spare his Men as much as possible, and rather to make choice of the Evening, as a Season more convenient for an Engagement. This Order was successfully observ'd by John; for when the Turks the next Morning, according to Custom, drew out to fight, and observ'd the Romans to keep within their Entrenchments, as if they were celebrating some Festival, they retir'd, and with a too forward Security laid down their Arms. But as soon as the Sun had pass'd his Meridian Point, and began to decline, the Romans issu'd out in exact Order of Battel, and tho' the Turks little expected them, yet they prepar'd to receive 'em. The Fight was manag'd at first with equal Obstinacy on both sides, till the Turks, who fought as well against the Sun, whose Beams mightily incommoded 'em, and a violent Wind, which blew the Dust full into their Faces, as they did against their Enemies, gave Ground, and fled away. This Defeat made Tzachas incline to a Peace, which was concluded between him and Ducas shortly after. The Conditions were, That Tzachas should have free Liberty to retire by Sea from Metylene to Smyrna, and that on the other Hand he would not oblige any of the Inhabitants at his Departure to go with him, nor injure 'em in their Persons or Estates. These Terms being mutually agreed to, and Hostages deliver'd on both sides, the Turk was so far from a Performance, that he forc'd several of the Inhabitants to attend him: Immediately upon this

Delassenus arriv'd before Metylene, and being inform'd of Tzachas his perfidious Dealings, he sail'd speedily after him, overtook, defeated, and sunk or seiz'd on most of his Piratical Ships, kill'd those that mann'd 'em, and releas'd the Captives; nor would Tzachas himself have escap'd, if the crafty Turk, apprehensive of the Danger, had not embark'd himself on Board a small Pinnace, instead of a Ship of Burden, and so eluded the Diligence of the Pursuers.

Being arriv'd at Smyrna, his restless Mind threw him upon new Attempts, which at last ended in his Destruction. He gave Orders for a new Fleet to be prepar'd, and supply'd with all the Materials requisite for his intended Expedition, and in the mean time he sat down with a resolute Army before Abydos, of which he hop'd to be Master in a few Days. But the Emperor having again declar'd Delassenus Admiral of his Fleet, upon the first News of Tzachas his Preparations, alarm'd the Sultan by his Letters writ to that purpose, in which he represented to him the dangerous Ambition of Tzachas, who, tho' he openly pretended his Designs were wholly against the Romans, at whose Empire he aim'd, yet that was no other than a Mask to cover his more secret Contrivances. The Roman Empire was too far out of his reach ever to attain it; that therefore tho' his Attempts were at present against that, he had the Sultan's Dignity in view, which he would make no scruple of Invading so soon as his present Successes should have strengthen'd him sufficiently for it; that therefore it behov'd him to consider him as his most dangerous Enemy, and join with the Romans in the Suppression of him, which would be an Undertaking no less prudent and honourable in him, than acceptable to the Emperor.

The Sultan's Jealousie was quickly alarm'd at the Receipt of this Letter, so that he immediately march'd with his whole Army against Tzachas; who, being press'd by Delassenus from the Sea, and the Sultan by Land, and fearing lest the Inhabitants of Abydos would sally upon him from the Town, at the same time that his Enemies assaulted him from without, in this Extremity

tremity he attempted to reconcile himself to the Sultan, who for that he was his Father-in-Law, and he ignorant of the Letter the Sultan had receiv'd from Alexius, he hop'd would be the sooner persuaded to receive him into Favour. The Sultan at first receiv'd him very graciously, and invited him to an Entertainment, where, in the midst of his Mirth, he order'd him to be murder'd, and shortly after concluded a Peace with the Emperor, which restor'd Tranquility to those Parts.

Tzachas
murder'd
by the Sultan's Order.

The War being thus extinguish'd in the East, broke out again presently after in the West, where Bolcanus a Dalmatian, a Man of principal Authority in that Country, infested the Roman Territories, and laid all waste before him; and tho', upon the Emperor's Approach, he pretended to submit, and promis'd to live peaceably for the future, yet Alexius was no sooner return'd to Constantinople, but he renew'd his Hostilities, and committed greater Outrages than he had done before. The Emperor at first sent Joannes Comnenus, his Brother's Son against him, whom, being young and unexperienc'd, the crafty Barbarian easily circumvented. He fell upon him suddenly by Night, destroy'd most of his Men, and forc'd him to a dishonourable Flight: After which he renew'd his Devastations, and did unspeakable Mischief to the Territories of the Empire, which made Alexius undertake a second Expedition against him, in which he was attended by the Flower of his Army; among whom none seem'd more zealous for his Service than Nicephorus Diogenes, tho' it afterwards appear'd that his loyal Outside serv'd only to gild over his treacherous Designs. This Nicephorus was Son to the late Emperor Romanus Diogenes, who together with him left another Son behind him call'd Leo: These Brothers had been banish'd by Michael Ducas, but restor'd by Alexius, who advanc'd 'em to honourable Employments, and always appear'd well inclin'd towards 'em, of which Leo was truly sensible, but Diogenes his aspiring Spirit would

A Design
against the Emperor's Life

discover'd,
and punished.

would not suffer him to be grateful. His ambitious Designs had been often discover'd, and as often pardon'd by the Emperor; who at length finding he had been washing the Aethiop white, that Diogenes instead of being reclaim'd continu'd to pursue his treacherous Ends, and seduc'd several of Power and Reputation to adhere to him, he then thought it time to provide for his own Safety; and being inform'd of a Design he had to murder him as he was bathing himself in this Expedition, he order'd him, and the most forward and dangerous of his Accomplices to be seiz'd, which was done accordingly, and their Eyes were pluck'd out, whether with the Emperor's Knowledge and Approbation 'tis left uncertain. Diogenes, when first he was seiz'd, was put to the Torture, which drew a Confession from him, by which among other things it appear'd that the late Empress Mary, whose Husband was Nicephorus his half-Brother, had been privy to the intended Revolt, but not to the Assassination. Of which when the Emperor was inform'd he was so far from resenting it, that he forbade any farther Mention to be made of it, and either would not believe it, or imputed it rather to the importunate Sollicitations of Nicephorus, than any Natural Disposition of that Princess against him. Nicephorus having thus lost his Sight was comforted and supported by the indulgent Emperor, who allow'd him a liberal Exhibition, by means of which he apply'd himself to Learning, and made a greater Proficiency than most others could have done with the Advantage of their Eyes against him, especially in Geometry, in the Study of which the Sight is so particularly useful; in this he was assisted by a celebrated Master, who describ'd the Figure upon Wood, or some other solid Matter, by which means his Pupil with a wonderful Progress obtain'd that by the Use of his Fingers, which others acquir'd by the Eye. However he was not so entirely employ'd in these Studies, but still Ambition and the Desire of Revenge raged within

within him, and thrust him on to new Attempts; in which he proceeded so far, that by a strange Infatuation he discover'd himself to some whom he thought his Friends, and ready to espouse his Interest, one of whom disclosed it to the Emperor, who sending for Diogenes obtain'd a sincere Confession from him, and once more pardon'd him.

The late Conspiracy being detected in the Field in a manner, and at the Head of the Army which Alexius was leading against the Enemies of the Empire, 'tis incredible to relate how much Horror the Soldiers conceiv'd at the Sense of it, how careful they appear'd for the Safety of the Emperor's Person, and with what Chearfulness they desir'd to be led against the Barbarians: Of which when Bolcanus was inform'd, and observing the Order of the Roman Forces, he grew doubtful of Success, and therefore once more offer'd Proposals for a Peace, promising most religiously to observe it when concluded. In this he seem'd so sincere, that the Emperor having receiv'd his Hostages condescended to a Peace, and return'd to Constantinople, where he had not long rested before fresh Attempts against the Empire call'd him abroad again.

Tho' the Scythians had continu'd quiet since the last Peace, yet it appear'd that it proceeded rather from the want of a Pretence, than an Inclination to a Rupture, which was now offer'd to 'em by an Impostor, who pretending to be Leo, the eldest Son of the late Emperor Diogenes, of whom mention has been made already, and who was slain in an Engagement with the Turks, laid Claim to the Empire. This Impostor came first poor and despicable to Constantinople, where he insinuated himself into the Acquaintance of such as were fit for his Purpose, to whom he boldly declar'd he was that Leo. The Emperor at first rather laugh'd at the Folly, than resented the Insolence of the Thing, but observing how his Followers encreas'd, and that the Relations of the late Emperor Diogenes were provok'd at the Indignity this Usurper offer'd their

The Scythians renew the War.

their Family, he banish'd him to Chersona, where he order'd him to be kept in strict Custody ; from whence however he escap'd by Night, and fled over to the Scythians, who joyfully receiv'd him, and proclaim'd him Emperor. And now having, as they thought, got an Emperor of their own to warrant their Proceedings, they prepar'd with much Caution and Secrecy to fall into the Roman Territories ; of which however Alexius had timely Advice, and took Care for the Security of the Borders, which he visited in Person, and supply'd the Frontier Towns with all Things necessary for their Defence, after which he return'd to Anchialus a City of Thrace seated upon the Euxine Sea. Here he was inform'd that the Barbarians had pass'd the Danube, and had taken in several Towns in their March, where the Usurper was proclaim'd Emperor: Having therefore given the necessary Orders for the Security of Adrianople, he resolv'd himself to defend Anchialus ; whither the pretended Leo march'd with his Army of Barbarians, proposing instantly to take that and the Emperor with it, and by that means make an End of the War at once. Here when both Armies had view'd each other for three Days together without coming to Blows, for the Emperor had the Advantage of the Ground, tho' the Scythians were more numerous, and the Barbarians saw they must of necessity venture a Battel before they could come near enough to the Town, they drew off, and march'd towards Adrianople, of which the Impostor pretended himself to be very sure, by the Interest he had in Nicephorus Bryennius who commanded in it, who he said had been highly oblig'd by his Father Diogenes when Emperor, adding that from thence they might easily march up to the Imperial City. The credulous Barbarians believing all he said, thought themselves already Masters of the Roman Empire, and so set out for Adrianople ; where notwithstanding the Hopes they had conceiv'd of Bryennius, they met with so vigorous a Resistance, that hardly one Day pass'd for near

near seven Weeks together wherein some considerable Action did not happen. At length the Besieg'd began to be so hardly press'd that Bryennius sent to the Emperor to let him know the Condition he was in, and Alexius made all possible speed to relieve him. In the mean time an Officer of the Army, a bold and resolute Man call'd Alacaseus, made use of a Stratagem which prov'd highly serviceable to the Emperor; for he, like Zopyrus of old, tore off his Beard, mangled his Face, and in a cruel manner disfigur'd his whole Body, in which lamentable Condition he betook himself to the Usurper, who with much Surprise ask'd him what he was on whom so much Cruelty had been exercis'd. Alacaseus reply'd, that he was the Son of one who had been united in an inviolable Friendship to his Majesty's Father, upon which Account Alexius had thus inhumanly us'd him; that he was come over to his Majesty as his Protector, conjuring him by the Memory of both their Fathers to revenge their mutual Injuries upon the Head of him who with-held his Majesty's undoubted Right from him. The Usurper, to whose Ears the Appellation of Majesty sounded very grateful, easily believ'd all he said, listen'd to his Advice, and repos'd an entire Confidence in him. Having thus prepar'd him, by vertue of some specious Pretences he entic'd him and a Company of his Scythian Followers into a Castle subject to the Emperor, from whom the Captain that commanded in it had receiv'd Orders to observe the Instructions he should receive from Alacaseus: Here the Mock Prince was receiv'd as into a Place betray'd to him, and being invited to a Banquet the Barbarians drank to that Excess, that their Horses and Arms were first seiz'd, and afterwards themselves, being unable to make any Resistance. Alexius hearing the Usurper was taken march'd against the Scythians, with whom he engag'd, and slew seven thousand upon the Spot, and took three thousand Prisoners. After which he return'd to Adrianople, there to treat with the Scythian Ambassadors who came with Offers of Peace, which they

An advantageous Stratagem.

The Scythians are overthrown.

they seemingly desir'd, only that their Forces might have time to withdraw into Places of Security, from whence, as soon as they had been refresh'd and recruited, they intended with fresh Vigour to renew the War. But the Emperor, being sensible of their Design, pursu'd 'em with great Diligence, overthrew 'em in two Engagements, entirely broke their Troops, and return'd with a great Booty, which he divided among those who had distinguish'd themselves most in the Service.

The Emperor, being return'd to Constantinople, was preparing to restrain the Incursions of the Turks, who threaten'd the City of Nicomedia, when he receiv'd Information of the Preparations the Western Christians were making for the Recovery of the Holy-Land. And since the Fortunes of those Adventurers bear so near a Relation to the ensuing Part of this History, it may not be judg'd improper to give the Reader a brief Account what it was that first gave Motion to that mighty Undertaking.

A. D.

1093.

The Holy War.

Among the many Pilgrims that continually resorted from all Parts of Europe to visit the Holy-Land, a French Man of Amiens in Picardy, whose Name was Peter, about the Year 1093 took a Voyage to Jerusalem, there to perform his Devotions where the Redemption of Mankind had been effected : Here the miserable Condition to which he saw the Christians reduc'd through the Tyranny of the Turks, under which all Asia, Syria, Palestine, and the City of Jerusalem groan'd, made him deliberate upon some Means for the Delivery of God's People from their cruel Servitude, and remove those Infidels from the most Holy Places, where they had sacrilegiously tyranniz'd for five hundred Years together. Upon Examination he found the Eastern Empire in too weak a Condition to give him any Hopes of Assistance and Redress, which were no where to be expected but from the West ; and therefore being a Man of Resolution and Courage, as well as zealous for God's Service, he undertook der took to inform the Pope and the Princes of the West of the deplorable Condition of the Christians in the Holy-Land, and represent it in so lively a Figure to 'em, as would effectually unite 'em in a generous Resolution to break off the Manacles of their Slavery, and deliver 'em from the tyrannick Yoke of the Enemies of Jesus Christ. Accordingly having receiv'd Letters from the Patriarch to that Purpose, he got on board the first Merchant Ship he met, and happily arriv'd at the Port of Bari, from whence he proceeded to the Court of Rome, where he addrest himself to the Pope, and having deliver'd him the Patriarch's Letters, he found in the Pope all the Inclinations he could wish to favour an Enterprize so illustrious, so advantageous to the Glory of God, so necessary to the Good of all Christendom, and which would render his Pontificate renown'd to all Posterity. Having receiv'd the Encouragement he very well deserv'd from the Pope, he travell'd over the greatest Part of Europe, treating in particular with most Princes, and in less than a Year's time inflam'd the Hearts of all Men with such a Desire to share in the Glory of redeeming the Holy Land, that both Princes and People embrac'd the Design with an equal Ardor, and longed for an Opportunity of being engag'd in this Religious War.

Urban II.

The Pope being inform'd by his industrious Hermit of the general Disposition he found in the Minds of Men to it, first summon'd the Council of Placentia, where Provisions were made for the Peace of the Church, and the People were render'd sensible of the Danger Christianity in general was in from the prevailing Arms of the Infidels, which had miserably over-run the Eastern Empire ; and shortly after in a Council celebrated at Clermont, some things were decreed as were thought necessarily previous to it, and then the Holy War was unanimously resolv'd upon, and the Crusade publish'd by the Pope, and generally embrac'd throughout the West.

A. D.
1095.

The

*The Princes
of the Crusade.*

The Princes, who were to be the chief Commanders in this Religious Expedition, were Hugh the Great, Brother to Philip the First of France; Robert, Duke of Normandy; Robert, Earl of Flanders; Raymond of Tbolouse; Godfrey of Bulloign, with his Brothers Baldwin and Eustace; and others whose Names are particularly mention'd by such as have written the History of this Holy War. Most of these Princes, who had not Treasures sufficient to maintain Armies equal to so great an Enterprize, generously sold or mortgag'd their Patrimonies, which it is observable were generally purchas'd by the Bishops, who thereby suffer'd the Secular Princes to impoverish themselves to serve Jesus Christ, whilst they enrich'd themselves with the Spoils of those Temporal Potentates.

Peter the Hermit begins the Expedition.

'Tis incredible to relate the Numbers that voluntarily list'd themselves upon this Occasion; Women, as well as Men; the Peasant, as well as him that had born Arms already; the Superstitious, and the Devout; the Old, and the Young; all united in the same Service, tho' some of 'em enter'd into it upon different Views: Which when Godfrey, who was the first that advanc'd towards Constantinople, where their general Rendezvous was appointed the Year following, observ'd, and fearing he should be clogg'd by a Multitude of unprofitable People, who were more likely to destroy him by Famine, than assist him by the Sword, he contriv'd to send 'em before under the Conduct of the Hermit Peter, with the Opinion of whose Sanctity they were so prepossess'd, and seem'd so charm'd with his Looks, and enchanted with his Words, that he thought he should have a Sovereign Power over them, and therefore readily accepted of the Command, and was declar'd Captain-General of this first Army of the Crusades, which had Orders to advance first towards Constantinople.

This Army Peter divided into two Bodies, one of which he led himself, and committed the other to the Conduct of a French Gentleman call'd Gautier, a good Captain,

A. D.
1096.

Captain, but being a Soldier of Fortune was furnam'd the Moneyless. Gautier began his March on the eighteenth Day of March, and having passed through Germany with great Difficulty enter'd into Hungary, through which Carloman the King of that Country, being himself a Christian, permitted him a Liberty of Passage, provided his Men paid for what they had; notwithstanding which, being refus'd Provisions upon the Frontiers of Bulgaria, they liv'd at Discretion, and plunder'd the Country; whereupon the Inhabitants taking up Arms, to the Number of an hundred and forty thousand Men, fell upon these unhappy Adventurers, kill'd great Numbers of 'em, and forc'd the rest to suffer the utmost Extremities of Hunger and Cold among the Woods; 'till the Prince of Bulgaria compassionating their Miseries furnish'd 'em with Guides, who conducted 'em to Constantinople, where they waited for the Arrival of Peter, who did not join them 'till the first of August, having been more unfortunate in his March than his Precursor: For Carloman having granted him the same Liberty he had done the other upon the same Conditions, Peter undertook an Action which neither became him as an Hermit or a Christian, and which sufficiently manifested how much God was offended at him, for transgressing the Bounds of his Profession, and undertaking a Charge which did in no wise belong to him. He had with him about forty thousand Foot, and a good Number of Horse, which observ'd his Orders well enough at his first setting out, but being arriv'd at Malleville, a good Town upon the Frontier of Hungary, under a Pretence of revenging the Injuries which some of the Soldiers of the first Army had receiv'd there, he took it by Storm, contrary to his Faith given, and put four thousand Hungarians to the Sword; which Example of their General authoriz'd the rest of the Army to measure out their own Revenge, so that there was no manner of Excess, no sort of Crimes, Perfidiousness, Cruelty, Robberies, Murder, Fire,

His unhappy Conduct.

or

He arrives at Con-
stantino-
ple,

or any kind of Violence, which these brutish Dregs of France, Lorrain and Germany did not commit in their March through Hungary and the Confines of Bulgaria; at which the Inhabitants were so justly exasperated, that they took all Occasions to fall upon them, and finding 'em in a disorderly March they slew above ten thousand of them upon the Place, took all their Baggage, their Provisions, their Wives, Children, and the old Men who could not fly, together with two thousand Waggon, among which were those that carry'd Peter's Treasure, design'd to pay them who had so unadvisedly paid themselves. Peter rally'd the rest with great Difficulty, and got with much ado to his Comrades at Constantinople, where the Emperor receiv'd him with a seeming Friendship, and having learnt from him the Quality of the Princes who were to be the Adventurers in this Holy War, and the Number of their Forces, advis'd him not to pass the Straits 'till their Arrival, nor expose his harra's'd Troops against the Turks; tho' at the Bottom this jealous Prince was very much concern'd at the Expedition. His late Wars with Robert had made him diffident and distrustful, he had entertain'd an inveterate Antipathy to Bohemond, who he understood was one of the Adventurers, and could not reflect on their mighty Preparations without a Heart full of Apprehensions. Being himself ambitious and aspiring, he concluded that tho' the common People might act upon Principles of Religion, yet it was very improbable the Princes should leave their own Dominions, and embark in so long and hazardous an Undertaking upon the same Motives. The Sense of his own Weakness, and their Power, which he esteem'd not to be opposed by open Force, made him resolve to be upon his Guard, and prepare to behave himself like a Friend, or Enemy, as the Necessity of his Affairs should require.

Alexius's Jealousies were shortly after fortify'd by the insupportable Insolence of that Army of Peasants,

of

of which Peter seem'd to have the Command, but who indeed were under no manner of Government; for being encamp'd without the Suburbs of Constantinople, they there renew'd the same Disorders which had been so fatal to 'em before in Hungary; they plunder'd and burnt all the beautiful Houses of Pleasure, and magnificent Palaces, which were without the City; they sacrilegiously robb'd the Churches, seeming to wage that War with the Christians, which they had vow'd against the Infidels: Whereupon the Emperor, grown weary of such troublesome Neighbours, not only permitted, but perswaded him to pass the Straits, which they immediately did, and behav'd themselves where-ever they march'd with their usual Barbarity, which shortly after met with an exemplary Punishment; for as it is seldom known that the Spirit of Union was ever long maintain'd among wicked Men, so it happen'd with this unruly Army, the Germans and Italians separated shortly after from the French, which hasten'd the Ruin of them all. For the Italians having seiz'd on a Town call'd Xerigordus were besieg'd by the Sultan, who upon the first Notice of the great Preparations of the Western Christians, had rais'd a formidable Army compos'd of all Asia, and found it no difficult matter to recover one Town from a headstrong ungovern'd Rabble; most of the Christians were taken with the Town, and those among 'em who would not renounce their Religion were put to the Sword.

The French in the mean time lay encamp'd near Helenopolis and Cibolus, two Villages situate in the Gulph of Nicomedia, and nearest the City of Nice, from whence they sent out their Parties to forage and destroy the Country, but were shortly after circumvented by the Sultan; who having planted an Ambush in a convenient Place between Helenopolis and Nice, he sent two Renegades to Peter's Camp, who told the French that the Italians and Germans had taken Nice, which they were plundering, and had hardly Hands

*His Army
is cut off by
the Sultan.*

sufficient to carry off the Booty, whilst they lay idle in their Camp. The French Soldiers were so alarm'd at this News, that without any Regard had to Military Discipline, or the Commands of their Officers, they issu'd out in a disorderly manner, and ran headlong into the Snares had been laid for 'em. The Slaughter of these miserable Christians was so great, that their Bones pil'd up together appear'd like a Mountain, some of which mix'd with Stones were us'd afterwards in the Building of a City, which was rais'd not far from the Place where they receiv'd their Defeat, and serv'd at once as a Monument to the Dead, and an Habitation to the Living.

Those, who had been able to save themselves from this woful Massacre, retir'd some to the Mountains, where they miserably perish'd, and others to Cibolus, where, the Town being shortly after taken by the Turks, they were all made Slaves. So that there did not remain above three thousand of that innumerable Multitude, which Peter had led out of the West, who with much Difficulty got on Board the Emperor's Fleet, who carry'd 'em disarm'd, and almost naked to Constantinople.

*Godfrey
arrives at Philippopolis.*

The unfortunate Beginning of this War was highly acceptable to Alexius, who had his Eyes every where, and growing every Day more diffident and jealous, had concluded rather to oppose and weaken the Christians upon every little Pretence, than to assist and cherish 'em. The miserable Remains of Peter's Army were hardly got to Constantinople, before the Emperor receiv'd Advice of Godfrey's Arrival at Philippopolis, whither he had led an Army of ten thousand Horse and seven thousand Foot over the vast Countries of Bulgaria, and sent an Ambassador to Constantinople to acquaint Alexius with his Arrival, and to demand the Liberty of Hugh the Great, Brother to the French King, who in his Passage from Bari to Dyrrachium, having left Part of his mighty Retinue and the Forces he was to lead behind him in Italy, and being separated rated in a Storm from the rest, was seiz'd by the Governor of Dyrrachium, and sent by the Emperor's Order thro' By-Ways to Constantinople, where he was detain'd Prisoner.

Whether this was done either for that the Emperor was offended at an arrogant Message he had receiv'd from Hugh, at the Beginning of his Expedition, as the Greeks alledge, or for that Alexius was well pleas'd to have so great a Prince in his Hands, who might serve for an Hostage to secure him against the Latins, is uncertain. However he return'd such an Answer to Godfrey, advanc'd by that time with his Army as far as Adrianople, that he thought he had just Cause to act against him as an open Enemy, and for eight Days together wasting the Country as he mov'd along, he march'd directly to Constantinople, where he rais'd such a Consternation, that Alexius gave Hugh his Liberty, sent to desire Peace, and promis'd Godfrey all imaginable Satisfaction. However this Peace, for which the Emperor was forc'd to petition, was very indifferently observ'd on his Part; for tho' he had undertaken to furnish the Army with Provisions, yet he fail'd of his Promise, and when upon that Account they began to live at Discretion, he attack'd 'em by Sea and Land, and in every Respect behav'd himself more like an open Enemy, than a Friend: Which detestable Infidelity Godfrey punish'd, by wasting all about Constantinople for five or six Days together, and by that means compell'd Alexius to desire a new Accommodation, who offering his Son John for an Hostage, invited the Princes to Constantinople, where they were receiv'd with great Magnificence, and according to the Custom of the Greek Emperors, Alexius adopted Godfrey for his Son, after which they came to this Agreement, That the Emperor should, from time to time, aid the Princes with all his Forces both by Sea and Land, that he would continually supply the Army with Provisions, and be serviceable to 'em upon all Occasions. On the other

Marches in an hostile Manner to Constantinople.

An Agreement betwixt him and the Emperor.

Hand, the Princes were to do nothing contrary to his Interest, but restore to him such Places of Importance as they should recover in Asia, and do Homage for the rest. After many Disputes and Arguments on both sides, the Princes bound themselves by Oath to the Observance of the second Article, but with this Limitation, that they were no longer oblig'd than whilst he punctually perform'd the first.

When these Matters were thus settled, Alexius, who was profusely magnificent, loaded the Princes with new Honours, and made 'em excessive rich Presents; but being shortly after inform'd that other Princes of the Crusade were upon their March at the Head of powerful Armies, especially Bohemond, Prince of Tarentum, of whom he thought he had great Reason to be distrustful, he desir'd Godfrey to pass with his Army towards Bitbynia, and encamp near Calcedon, alledging he was not able long to subsist his Forces where they lay, tho' the true Reason was to avoid the Presence of so many Guests at once, most of whom he had justly provok'd by his Prevarications and Treachery. However Godfrey being desirous to wait for the Arrival of Bohemond, and being at the same time sensible of Alexius's Jealousies, and Bohemond's Resentments, he undertook, at the Emperor's Request, a Mediation between 'em, and so well manag'd the haughty Spirit of that great Prince, whom he met for that purpose on his March, that he brought him with him to Constantinople, where he was receiv'd by Alexius with all imaginable Marks of Esteem and Affection; and the Prince, who was willing to remove all Obstacles that might retard 'em in their intended Expedition, behav'd himself on his side with an open generous Confidence, and so both endeavour'd for the present to conceal what it was impossible for either to overcome.

All things being thus happily concerted at Constantinople, the Forces pass'd the Bosphorus and encamp'd near Calcedon, where the Measures necessary to be taken taken for the Siege of Nice were consulted, the Emperor himself promising to assist in Person at that Enterprize, tho' he secretly propos'd to obtain that City to himself, rather by the Concession of the Turks, than the Force of the Christian Armies.

Nice, the Metropolis of Bythinia, famous for the first Oecumenical Council celebrated here against the Arian Heresie, stands in the middle of a fertile and pleasant Valley, encompass'd by high Mountains, and a capacious Lake, which on the Western Quarter serves as a Natural Fortification, and supplies it plentifully with all the Commodities of the Country; notwithstanding which it was more strongly fortify'd by Solyman, who having push'd on his Conquests as far as the Propontis, fixt here the Seat of his Empire, as most commodiously favouring the Desire the Turks had entertain'd of passing one Day into Europe. Here Solyman, his Successor, usually maintain'd a strong Garrison, but when first he heard of the Enterprize the Christians were about in the West, he reinforc'd it with the choicest of his Troops, and went in Person into Persia, to solicit the Assistance of the Princes of his Nation. On the sixteenth of May in the Year 1097, tho' Solyman was just then return'd with a powerful Army out of the East, and had posted himself in the Mountains, the Princes distributed their several Quarters in his open view, knowing their Forces superior to his in Number, and by that means able to cover the Siege; for at a general Muster they were found to be no fewer than six hundred thousand Men, of which an hundred thousand were Horse, besides Priests, Monks, Women, Children, and Servants, whose Numbers were infinite; notwithstanding which so just and exact a Discipline was maintain'd among 'em, that all sorts of Debauchery, which usually attend a licentious Multitude, were banish'd the Camp.

During this Siege, which was maintain'd for seven Weeks, both the one side and the other gave eminent Instances of their Obstinacy and Resolution : Solyman descended twice from the Mountains at the Head of a numerous Army, with a design to raise it, but was as often repuls'd by the more numerous Christians : The Besieg'd made frequent Sallies upon the Assailants, who receiv'd 'em with a Martial Constancy, and still forc'd 'em to retire with great Loss to the Garrison ; who notwithstanding continu'd to defend the Place with a chearful Courage, 'till they saw the Christians Masters of the Lake, by which they expected to receive the Relief they had sent to desire of Solyman, and then they entertain'd Thoughts of a Rendition. For whilst that Lake was open they receiv'd constant Supplies of Provision, and all other Necessaries at their Pleasure ; of which when Alexius was inform'd, he fitted out some little Frigots, which commanded the Lake, and intercepted their usual Commerce.

For tho' the Emperor had promis'd to join with the Princes, yet considering how much their Forces exceeded his, that they were chiefly commanded by such of whose Affections he had great Reason to be doubtful, he chose rather to be a Spectator of that War, in which he had sworn to be a Companion ; and therefore continu'd at a Place call'd Pelecanus, from whence he observ'd the Progress of the Besiegers, and at the same time held a Correspondence with the Defendants, whom he solicited by Butumites his Lieutenant to surrender the Place to him ; which, upon mighty Promises of Advantages, as the highest Honours, and magnificent Pensions to the Sultan's Wife and Sister, and liberal Presents to the leading and most deserving Men of the Garrison, they condescended to. Tho' the Princes had timely Intimation of this Treaty, yet being sensible that it would hasten the Surrender of the Place, they chose rather to conceal their Knowledge of it, than obstruct it by a Resentment.

which is
surrender'd
to Alexius.

Alexius

Alexius being thus become Master of Nice, and at the same time conscious to himself of the dishonourable Means by which he obtain'd it, endeavoured to conceal or varnish over his Guilt by his profuse Liberality to the Franks, making most magnificent Presents to all the Principal Commanders, and bestowing large Donatives upon the disappointed Soldiers, who had promis'd themselves the Spoils of the vanquish'd City; notwithstanding which the Distrust the Princes had entertain'd of him made 'em always upon their Guard, and the common Soldiers charg'd him every Day with whole Volleys of Curses and Execrations.

After the Reduction of Nice the Princes took leave of the Emperor, and march'd immediately towards Syria, having first separated into two Bodies for the Conveniency of Forage and Subsistence, Bohemond taking the Left Hand and Godfrey the Right, being however both careful that the Army should not be distant above two Miles the one Body from the other. Bohemond marching first, was three Days after this Separation discover'd by Solyman in a large Plain; who concluding that small Body contain'd the whole Christian Army, and he being reinforc'd with new Troops, which made his amount to three hundred and sixty thousand Turks and Persians, all Horse, besides an infinite Number of Arabians, who were also Cavalry, he suddenly seiz'd on all the Passes of the Hills, and the Avenues leading out of the Valley, intending to surprize the Christians early next Morning, as they were going to decamp.

Of this Bohemond being advertis'd, he instantly dispatch'd some Horse to acquaint Godfrey of the Danger he was in, and made the best Provision he could to oppose the terrible Shock he expected from the Enemy, who came pouring down into the Valley to charge the Christians, whom they expected to find half conquer'd to their Hands by their Fear and

Bohemond his Army in great Danger.

The Turks
defeated.

and Disorder. The Christians receiv'd the Charge with great Constancy and Resolution, but would in the end have been over-power'd by Numbers, had not Godfrey appear'd upon the Mountains, and in an Instant made an Alteration in the Face of the Battel; for Solyman retreated presently to the Hills, where he thought the Christians would not dare to attack him, which however they did with so much Execution, that the Enemy were put to Flight, leaving their Camp, and above three thousand of the Principal Persons of Quality among the Turks, besides a prodigious Number of Arabians, and other ordinary Soldiers behind 'em.

The Christians besiege Antioch.

The Christians, having refresh'd themselves for two Days in the Valley, continu'd their March, advancing towards Syria, suffering much as they march'd along; for the Turks, who no longer dar'd to encounter 'em hand to hand, destroy'd the Country through which they were to pass, which reduc'd 'em to extream Want, especially in their Passage over the Mountains and Desarts. However, after having overcome Difficulties that others would have thought invincible, they arriv'd at Antioch, accompany'd by Taticius, or Tatin, the Emperor's Lieutenant, sent rather to be a Spy upon 'em, and betray 'em, than to assist 'em. The Season was far advanc'd when they arriv'd near Antioch, and the Town supply'd with a numerous Garrison, and every thing requisite for an effectual Defence; notwithstanding which, considering it consisted with the Reputation of their Arms to set down before it, they put the whole Army in Order of Battel, and on the twenty first of October march'd in a terrible Triumph, and encamp'd within a Mile of it.

It is Foreign to my present Design to insist upon the Particulars of this Siege, which lasted nine Months, and is most memorable for the many Actions perform'd in the Course of it, it being hard to determine whether the Besiegers or Defendants were expos'd expos'd to the greatest Hardships, or endured 'em with the greatest Patience and Resolution. The Fury of War, and the Vicissitudes of it, appear'd no where more conspicuous than upon this Occasion. The Pestilence and Famine, Envy and Emulation, Anguish and Despair rag'd equally within the Walls and without. That which ought to have hasten'd Alexius to the Succour of the Assailants, the Necessities they were under, made him return back when he was upon his march towards 'em : So that 'tis no wonder the Princes did not restore Antioch to him, as they had before oblig'd themselves to do, but made Bohemond Prince of it, and that for a Reason, which because it includes the Means by which they got it into their Hands, a brief Account of it may not be judg'd amiss in this Place.

Pyrrhus, a Citizen of Quality in Antioch, was born of Christian Parents, but pretended to embrace the Mahometan Superstitions to save his Estate, as several other Antiochians had done in fourteen Years time, when first it was conquer'd by the Turks. This Man had obtain'd so great an Esteem among the Infidels, that Accien the Sultan, charm'd with his good Qualities, entrusted him with the Guard of three Towers, and made him his Secretary of State. Notwithstanding this, Pyrrhus, who secretly abhorr'd the Abominations of that Religion, to which he had outwardly conform'd, and being sensible how difficult it would be for the Christians to take the Town by Force, conceiv'd an ardent Desire to redeem his Country from the Servitude and Oppression of the Turks; to which he was prompted by his Son, who at the beginning of the Siege was in a Sally taken Prisoner by Bohemond, and was so transported with his generous Treatment and Discharge, (for he refus'd to receive the Ransom Pyrrhus had offer'd for him) that at Bohemond's Instigation he induc'd his Father at his Return to think of some means of delivering the Town up to the Christians, and the Father from that time forward maintain'd tain'd a secret Correspondence with Bohemond by his Son's means, who was often sent out into the Camp under the Pretence of being a Spy, and at length he agreed upon a certain Day to put the three Towers, of which he had the Command, into his Hands. About this time the Great Sultan of Persia had rais'd a most formidable Army of two hundred thousand Horse, and an innumerable Multitude of Foot, which were then on their March to the Relief of Antioch. Whereupon Bohemond, who was a politick designing Prince, the very Day that Pyrrhus and he had agreed, as is before mention'd, told the Princes in a Council of War with a melancholy Air, That the Evils which the Army endured were insupportable, and yet that they must shortly be forc'd to abandon the Siege, and rise from the Town, after they had lost so many brave Men before it, since so prodigious an Army was marching to its Relief. That nothing remain'd more to be done, but to try if any among 'em could gain the Town by Surprise or Intelligence, before the Succours arriv'd; and to encourage every one to undertake something of that Nature for the publick Good, he propos'd the Principality of Antioch as a Reward to him who should perform the Exploit, and thereby disengage the Army from so long, so bloody and expensive a Siege.

Antioch
betray'd to the Christians.

Tho' the rest of the Princes easily perceiv'd the Artifice of Bohemond, yet their Scouts continually alarming 'em with the Approach of the Succours, they in the end decreed that he who could gain Antioch should be Master of it; whereupon Bohemond instantly advis'd Pyrrhus, that he was prepar'd to execute what had been concerted between 'em; and Pyrrhus the Night following, upon a Signal given, threw down a Cord, with which he drew up a Ladder, and fasten'd it to one of the Tower Battlements, whereupon a Company of Bohemond's Soldiers, appointed for that purpose, mounted the Tower, which whilst some of 'em master'd, killing all the Turks they met, others broke open a Sally Port, at which the Troops enter'd,

and

and seizing the Gates the whole Army was, by break of Day, got without any Resistance into the City, where the greatest part of the Turks were kill'd, some in their Beds, others in the Streets, and Accien himself, who fled away in a Disguise, was taken shortly after, and slain by some Christians of Syria.

The Princes being thus become Masters of Antioch, sent Hugh the Great, and Baldwin, Earl of Heynault, to give the Emperor an Account of their Success, and press him to make good his Oath, and in Person join his Forces with those of the Princes, who got little by that unfortunate Ambassage; for the Earl of Heynault perish'd in the way, nor was it ever known what Death he dy'd, tho' it was generally suspected that he was taken Prisoner, and murder'd by the Emperor's Soldiers in Nice. Hugh got safe to Constantinople, but instead of returning to the Princes with an Account of his Embassy, he parted from thence in so abrupt a manner, that some of the Writers of that Time took Occasion from thence to mention him much to his Disadvantage; and the Emperor was so far from being persuaded to join with the Princes then, that he resolv'd never to do it.

A. D.
1098.

Indeed at that time he had a justifiable Excuse for his Absence, for Tzachas still continu'd Master of Smyrna, from whence he exercis'd his Piracies, and infested the Sea-Coasts of the Empire; and Tangripermes, a Man of the same Faith and Practices, had seiz'd on Ephesus, as some of his Followers had done on Rhodes, Chios, and other Places, which they judg'd the most fit for their Piratical Excursions. Here they built their Ships, and laid 'em up after any Expedition; here they stor'd their Booty, and sold such Christians, as fell into their Hands, into a miserable Slavery.

This made Alexius think it requisite to Man out such a Fleet, and raise an Army as should not only be able to restrain the Barbarians, but to remove, and, if possible, to extirpate them. Accordingly he besieg'd

Smyrna

Smyrna by Sea and Land, which, despairing of Relief, surrend'rd upon such Conditions as the besieg'd themselves requir'd. But before the Fleet loosed from thence, Caspan, whom the Imperial General had made Governor of the Place, was murder'd by a Turk, of whom some Christians had made pressing Complaints for his Violence and Extortion, whereupon the Sailors and Soldiers in a confus'd Number fell into the City, where in an Instant they slew ten thousand of the Turkish Inhabitants.

Ten Thousand Turks slain by the Christians
at Smyrna.

The Imperial General march'd from Smyrna to Ephesus, where he engag'd with Tangripermes, and defeated him, killing great Numbers of his Men, and taking no less than two thousand Prisoners, consisting chiefly of their principal Officers and prime Nobility among the Turks, who by the Emperor's Order were dispers'd throughout the Islands. After this Philadelphia, Laodicea, and other Maritime Places of no small Importance fell into the Emperor's Hands, which shortly after prov'd the Subject of a War between the Emperor and Bohemond, the newly elected Prince of Antioch: For that Prince, mindful of his Hereditary Quarrel to Alexius, and offended at the Demand he had made of Antioch, which he claim'd as his, he sent his Nephew Tankred with part of his Forces to sit down before Laodicea, and take it by Storm if the Defendants refus'd to surrender. The Town was provided with a Garrison, which the Emperor judg'd sufficient to defeat any Designs of the Turks, but not strong enough to oppose the Courage of the victorious Christians; so that after some short Resistance it was deliver'd up to Tankred, together with other the most considerable Fortresses in all Cilicia. Of which when Alexius was inform'd, he sent and renew'd his Claim to Antioch, and upon a Repulse prepar'd to make good his Pretensions by the Force of Arms; and hearing that the Bishop of Pisa and other Princes in the West were preparing a great Fleet for the Support of the Christians in the East,

East, who had lately taken Jerusalem, in which they found so much Booty, that the whole Army was enrich'd beyond Imagination, he gave Orders for the building more Ships of War to be added to those he had already at Sea, and made Taticius his admiral; resolving to stop the Passage of the Western Fleet, 'till the Princes had deliver'd up such Towns as he challeng'd from 'em. Accordingly both Fleets met and engag'd near Rhodes, where the Imperialists prevail'd, and entirely defeated the Enemy's Fleet; but were themselves overtaken by a Tempest in their Return to Constantinople, which destroy'd all their Ships but the Squadron commanded by Taticius himself.

*Jerusalem
taken by the Christians.*

Bohemond, observing the Emperor was in earnest, and that after all his Prevarications he began now to declare more openly, put himself upon his Guard; and hearing that Alexius's General, call'd Catacuzenus, was preparing to besiege Laodicea, after he had in vain attempted to hinder the Genoese from landing, and marching to the Assistance of the Christians in the Holy-Land, he resolv'd to march in Person to the Relief of it. Before his Arrival the Greeks were Masters of the Town and Haven, but the Franks continu'd to make a vigorous Defence in the Castle, into which with much Difficulty he threw some Supplies, tho' that shortly after fell into the Emperor's Hands, and then return'd to Antioch, where he consulted what Methods were most proper to oppose and annoy the Emperor. Upon Examination he found he had not Strength sufficient at present either by Sea or Land to contend with him, that he could hope for no Recruits but out of the West, and that his Presence there was absolutely necessary for the raising of 'em, and was sensible at the same time of the Danger he must unavoidably run in a Voyage thither, the Emperor being absolute Master at Sea. In this Extremity he had recourse to a Stratagem, which was no less wonderful in the Contrivance, than

*Bohe-
mond his
Stratagem.*

than dangerous in the Execution. Having settled his Affairs at Antioch, the Management of which he committed to such in whom he could safely confide, he commanded a Report to be spread abroad of his Death, which was confirm'd by the Behaviour of his Friends, and the Conduct of his Court. When he thought no one would be so scrupulous as to doubt the Truth of it, he was put into a Coffin, and shipp'd on board a Vessel prepar'd for that purpose, which was to carry him to Rome in Order to his Interment. By this Artifice he deluded the Curiosity of the Emperor's Officers, who suffer'd his Corps, as they took it, to pass unmolested, first to the Island Coryphus, and thence into Italy; and the Emperor was hardly sensible of this unhappy Oversight, till he was inform'd of the mighty Preparations Bohemond was making against him.

The unhappy Emperor never labour'd under greater Apprehensions than he did upon this Occasion. He was sensible how highly he had provok'd Bohemond, and how ready that haughty Spirit was to resent it. He knew he was already obnoxious to the Pope and the Italian Princes, so that it was extreamly difficult for him to create any Diversion on that side to defeat the Designs of a powerful Enemy, who seem'd sworn to his Ruin. These Apprehensions were improv'd by the Appearance of a Comet of an extraordinary size, which rose in the West, and by an unnatural Motion travell'd on towards the East, where it set. The Appearance of this Star, and its irregular Progress, at first very much perplex'd the superstitious Emperor, 'till he in some measure was eas'd of his Fears by Basilus a Mathematician, for whom he had a great Regard, who assur'd him, that as by its Rising in the West, it foretold the Invasion of the Latins, so its Setting in the East intimated, that in the East they would all be destroy'd. At Thessalonica, whither the Cares of the War, and approaching Dangers had drawn him, he narrowly escap'd the Effects of a Conspiracy, which being form'd by Persons of the highest Rank, as well in the Church and the Senate as in the Army, it serv'd to let him know how his own Subjects were dispos'd against him.
of

*A Conspiracy against the Emperor,
discover'd.*

Whilst he lay under these Disquietudes his Fleet was ready to put to Sea, and he order'd his Admiral, whose Name was Contostephanus, upon Forfeiture of his Eyes, so diligently to watch the Seas, as not to suffer Bohemond to pass by him without an Engagement. At the same time he sent Orders to the Governor of Dyrrachium to be constantly upon his Guard, and not suffer himself to be surpriz'd. But Contostephanus, instead of following his Instructions, made a Descent into Italy, and laid Siege to Brundusium, where he receiv'd an absolute Defeat, which was chiefly owing to the brave Conduct of Tancred's Mother. This Misfortune prov'd in the Issue of worse Consequence to Alexius his Affairs, than might have reasonably been at first expected. For six Scythians being taken Prisoners in the Action they were sent to Bohemond, who carry'd 'em to the Pope, telling him 'twas with such Instruments as these Alexius endeavour'd to defend and enlarge his own Dominions, and encroach upon his Neighbours, fighting at the Head of Pagans against Christians, and arming Barbarians against the most civiliz'd Nations of Europe. By these Artifices Bohemond stirr'd up the Pope and People against Alexius, so that his Levies were compleat in an Instant, every one crowding to receive the Pope's Benediction, and to engage in the War against so abominable a Tyrant as they conceiv'd Alexius to be.

*Great Preparations
in the West
against A-
lexius.*

The Emperor's Fleet lay at Aulon in Albania, when Bohemond put to Sea; and tho' they had receiv'd Express Orders from their Master to hinder his Passage, yet terrify'd at the Number and Burden of his Ships, they all fled, and Bohemond landed his Forces without any Opposition at that Place, which they had relinquish'd to him, and prepar'd to besiege Dyrrachium, of which that impetuous Prince was already Master in his

Bohe-
mond Besieged Dyrrachium.

Alexius's
Artifices.

his own Imagination. In Order to which he seiz'd on all the Towns adjoining to it, and having burnt his Ships in the sight of his Army, thereby giving 'em to understand there was no Possibility of their returning home, he sat down with his whole Army before it, and expos'd himself and all his Forces to such unavoidable Difficulties, as, had they been foreseen, would have been sufficient to deter him from so dangerous an Undertaking. For the Emperor, being Master at Sea, he could not from thence receive any Provisions, which there was no possibility of getting by Land, where Alexius had seiz'd on all the Avenues leading to Dyrrachium. This begot a great Famine in his Camp, which was follow'd by a Sicknefs that swept off great Numbers of his Men daily. In the mean time the Besieg'd made a vigorous Defence, and Alexius, who was not willing to venture all upon one Stake, declin'd bringing it to a Battel, and endeavour'd to weaken Bohemond's Army by sowing Dissentions in it. Having learn'd what Officers in his Army that Prince had the greatest Dependance upon, he sent such Letters to them as seem'd no other than Answers to some others he had lately receiv'd from them before, in which he thank'd 'em for the great Services they had done him in betraying Bohemond's Designs to him, and exhorted 'em to persist in the good Work they had began, and effectually deserve the Rewards he had abundantly prepar'd for 'em. These Letters were directed to Bohemond's own Brother, and other his most intimate Friends and Confidents; hoping by such means to create such a Jealousie of 'em, and the Prince, as would in time end in the Ruin both of them and himself. These Letters, being thus dispatch'd, he sent a Man of experienced Loyalty, who posting a nearer way to Bohemond's Camp, immediately demanded Admittance to that Prince, to whom he pretended, that having receiv'd some Injuries from the Emperor, he had renounc'd his Allegiance, and was come to follow his Fortunes, being being able, by a timely Discovery of some Treasons intended against him, to make way for his Reception : When he was ask'd what those Treasons were, and who were the Traitors, he boldly accus'd Bohemond's own Brother, and such others as had been before agreed upon betwixt him and Alexius, referring himself to the Contents of some Letters, which he knew were upon the Road, for the Truth of what he had declar'd ; undertaking to intercept the Bearers of 'em, before they should be able to deliver 'em according to their Directions, provided he might be assur'd of the Lives of those who did nothing out of Ill-will to him, but in Obedience to an haughty imperious Master ; which Bohemond, who was surpriz'd at the Novelty of the thing, without any Hesitation granted. Accordingly the Men were seiz'd, and the Letters deliver'd to Bohemond, who opening 'em with great Impatience, read 'em over with an astonish'd Eye, and was at first so thoroughly persuaded that they were genuine, that he kept within his Tent six Days together, seriously debating with himself what Councils to take in so critical a Conjunction. At last, either considering that the Removal of so many experienc'd Men at once would be of a more dangerous Consequence than the Continuance of them in the Service, however ill affected they might be to him ; or having at length some Reason to distrust the Sincerity of those Letters, he continu'd his Brother and all the rest in their Employments, gave 'em fresh Instances of his good Inclinations towards 'em, and of the Trust he repos'd in 'em, not to be shaken by so weighty a Testimony as those Letters seem'd to produce against 'em.

In the mean time Acts of Hostilities were continu'd on both sides, and the Siege advanc'd extream slowly, for the Besieg'd made a vigorous Defence, and had great Plenty of all things in the Garrison. Momentary Skirmishes and Party Engagements happen'd almost every Day, in which for the most part the Emperor had the Advantage, and so closely press'd Bohe-

A. D.
1109.

Bohe-
mond dies.

mond, who began to be in want of almost every thing necessary for a Camp, that that haughty Spirit first heard patiently some Overtures of a Peace, and at length was prevail'd upon to conclude it upon Terms very honourable to the Emperor, and no less satisfactory to him, considering the present Condition of his Affairs. After which, having dispers'd his Troops into such Winter Quarters as were allotted him by the Emperor, he himself return'd into Italy, saith Anna Comnena, tho' we learn from others that he went forwards to Antioch, where he dy'd within six Months, and went to seek that Peace beyond the Grave, which his Honour and Ambition would not suffer him to enjoy on this side of it. He was undoubtedly one of greatest Men of that Age, he was tall and well-shap'd; of an Appearance mixt with Terror and Delight, at the same time threatening and inviting; He was in Designing judicious, in Execution forward; neither soften'd by Prosperity, nor dejected in Adversity. His great Courage and Generosity made him esteem'd by those that knew him, and admired even by Strangers; so that we may have reason to believe Anna Comnena, when she saith he was the bravest Man of his Age, except that Idol of her Heart, her Father Alexius.

Bohemond, among other things, agreed, at the Conclusion of the late Peace, to restore to the Emperor such Towns as he with-held from him in Asia, to which Tancred now laid Claim upon his Uncle's Death, in Right of the young Bohemond his Cousin, and refus'd to surrender 'em; of which the Emperor made loud Complaints, and requir'd him to observe the Articles: To which he return'd a resolute Answer, and let the Emperor know he was to expect nothing but what he could obtain by down-right Force. Upon this Occasion Alexius had recourse to his usual Artifices; he endeavour'd to persuade Baldwin, at that time King of Jerusalem, to assist him against Tancred, or at least to sit Neuter, whilst he recover'd cover'd his undoubted Right from him. But finding that neither Baldwin or any other of the Princes of the Crusade were inclinable to favour his Pretences against Tancred, he thought fit to suspend his Claim for the present, and the rather because his Jealousie was awaken'd with the new Preparations he heard the Italians were making in the West.

'Tis no wonder if this Prince, having in some Respect or other provok'd all the World, thought the whole World combin'd against him, and receiv'd an Alarm from every Motion of those whom his Guilt taught him to consider as his Enemies: On whatever Quarter he cast his Eyes he thought he had just Reason to put himself upon his Guard, and that at a time when he was least able to make a Resistance. The Turks were not more distrustful by him than the Christians themselves, nor could he safely confide even in his own Subjects, who were continually forming Conspiracies against him, or terrifying him by their Rebellions; add to all this, the Infirmities of his Body, afflicted by the Gout, and other Distempers which usually accompany Old Age, and render Life a Burden. Notwithstanding which, being inform'd that the Turks had renew'd their Incursions, which they made up almost as far as the Walls of Nice, he march'd in Person against 'em, and gave 'em an Overthrow that was thought worthy such a Triumph at Constantinople, as the Inhabitants of that Place had not seen for a long time before.

Notwithstanding this Defeat of the Turks, they shortly after renew'd their Incursions, and destroy'd the Borders of the Empire for a considerable time without Control, for that the Forces of the East had been some time before sent against the Scythians, who were preparing to give Alexius new Trouble, and the Emperor himself was laid up of the Gout. However, being at length recover'd, and having review'd his Forces, he march'd against the Turks, who with an insolent Barbarity destroy'd all before 'em, but at the 1118.

A. D.

Emperor's Approach retir'd without venturing a Battle; and when they heard he was return'd to Nicomedia, they renew'd their Hostilities with their usual Confidence, and were frequently defeated by Alexius's Lieutenants, who were left behind for that purpose, especially by Nicephorus, who drove the Sultan himself out of the Field, and won several Places of Importance from the Turks near Iconium; at which, and a second Expedition of Alexius against 'em, they were so terrify'd that they immediately desir'd Peace, which was readily granted 'em by the Emperor.

*Alexius
dies.*

This Peace being so happily concluded, the Emperor never after appear'd in the Field; but being now as cautious of provoking his Neighbours, as he had been heretofore forward in it, he apply'd himself to Acts of Charity, and to the healing those Divisions, with which the Greek Church was at that time grievously afflicted. These Cares took up the rest of his Time 'till his Death, which happen'd shortly after occasion'd by a violent Cold, and his own Wilfulness, or the Ignorance and unseasonable Disputes of his Physicians. He dy'd in the thirty eighth Year of his own Reign, the last of Baldwin the first King of Jerusalem, and the twenty second after the first Expedition of the Western Christians for the Recovery of the Holy-Land, An. Dom. 1118.

His Character.

The Character of this Prince is differently represented by the Greek Authors, and those who have written the History of the Holy Wars; the Græcians, especially his Daughter Ann, placing him among those excellent Princes whose Virtues adorn'd the Imperial Throne; and the rest making him worse than the worst of those who defil'd it. It is agreed on all Hands, that he was one of the greatest Politicians of his Time, and knew how to be Master of his Designs by Artifice, when it was not to be effected by open Force. His greatest Fault was his Ambition, and his most shining Talent Diffimulation. He was patient of Labour; and, upon Occasion, a great Time.

Time-server. He outwardly profess'd a great Veneration for the Church, but made it appear, when ever his Necessities requir'd it, how superficial that Veneration was. That he was grateful and munificent, appears from his Behaviour to his Brother and the rest of his Friends, who had been instrumental in his Advancement. He was Perfidious, but not Cruel, seldom punishing those, who during the long Course of his Reign so often attempted him by their Conspiracies, otherwise than with Banishment and Confiscation. His Behaviour to the Western Adventures was unworthy a Prince and a Christian, but that in some measure it was to be excus'd by the Jealousies he had upon good grounds entertain'd against Bobemond. His Reign was for the most part full of Cares and Anxieties, and at last he left the Empire to his Son, who govern'd more to the Satisfaction of his People than his Father had done before him.

Whilst Alexius lay Sick, he was earnestly sollicitated by the Empress and his Daughter Ann, to declare her Husband Bryennius Emperor, and to deprive his own Son John of the Succession; and tho' Alexius absolutely deny'd their Request, and gave 'em unanswerable Reasons for that Denial, yet they persisted in their Sollicitations; and that the rather, because they heard John, having got the Imperial Signet from off his dying Father's Finger, had caus'd himself to be proclaim'd Emperor, by those of his Relations and others who were well affected to his Cause. This made 'em more importunate with Alexius, who continu'd deaf to their Importunities, 'till John was got at the Head of his Party into the Palace, immediately upon which the aged Emperor dy'd, and left him his Successor without any Competitor.

John, being confirm'd in the Imperial Dignity, and crown'd by the Hands of the Patriarch, remov'd such Officers from Court as were suspected by him, and preferr'd none to succeed 'em but his own Friends and Relations, and such others as were the most Eminent for their Birth in the Empire. Notwithstanding this prudent Management, he had not worn the Imperial Purple a full Year before some of his nearest Relations conspired against him, and by Oath oblig'd themselves to advance Bryennius; this was rather contriv'd by the haughty and ambitious Temper of Ann, than desir'd by Bryennius, who was so far from approving what had been design'd, that his Remissness and Aversion to publick Affairs blunted the Edge of the Conspirators Swords, who had undertaken to murder the Emperor by Night. A treasonable Design not executed proves pernicious to none but the Traitors: The Conspirators being discover'd, and seiz'd the next Day, suffer'd no other Punishment than a Confiscation of their Goods, which however were shortly after restor'd to 'em through the Clemency of the Emperor, and they receiv'd into Favour. Ann her self, who had given Life to the Conspiracy, being the first who tasted of his Royal Bounty, which was in a great Measure owing to the Virtue and Generosity of Axuchus, a Persian by Birth, who being in the City of Nice when it was taken by the Christians, was among other Captives presented to Alexius; and that Emperor, observing something extraordinary in the Youth, order'd him to attend as a Companion upon his Son, who from that time forward conceiv'd so great an Affection for him, that when he came to be Emperor he was declar'd his chief Favourite and prime Minister, John thinking he could never do enough for the belov'd Companion of his Studies and Diversions. Axuchus, on the other side, behav'd himself with the greatest Moderation, and tho' his Authority was so great in the Empire, that many of the Royal Blood thought it no Disgrace to alight from their Horses when they met him, and pay him Homage; yet was he so far from the Arrogance of unworthy upstart Favourites, that he demean'd himself on all Occasions like a Servant,

daily

John, the new Emperor, his great Moderation.

daily endeavouring to establish a good Understanding in the Royal Family, and reconciling the Offenders to the injur'd Prince. By this Man's good Offices the Emperor was perfectly reconcil'd to his Mother and Sister, and having establish'd an agreeable Harmony at home, he found himself at leisure to observe the Turks, who, in Defiance of the Peace lately concluded with his Father, had broken into Phrygia, where he overthrew 'em in several Engagements, recover'd all the Places of Importance out of their Hands, and among the rest the City of Laodicea, which he secur'd with new Walls and other Fortifications. After which he laid Siege to Sozopolis, a considerable Town in Pamphilia, from whence the Turks by their frequent Excursions very much oppress'd the Subjects of the Empire. The Town was strongly fortify'd, and almost inaccessible, so that he found it difficult to force the numerous Garrison by the usual Methods of a Siege, and had Recourse to a Stratagem, which had the Success he desired, and made him Master of the Town: For having by a pretended Assault drawn the Turks out, and by a counterfeit Flight entic'd 'em into an Ambuscade, part of his Forces got between them and the City, and fell upon the Rear, whilst the other fac'd about and attack'd 'em upon the Front, killing great Multitudes upon the Spot, taking several Prisoners, and suffering none to escape, but a few who ow'd their Lives to the Fleetness of their Horses. After which not only Zozopolis fell into his Hands, but several other Places in those Parts, formerly Members of the Roman Empire, but late subdu'd, and added to the Dominions of the Turks.

*His Wars
with the Turks.*

These successful Expeditions in the Beginning of his Reign, render'd John terrible to his Enemies in Asia, who suffer'd him therefore peaceably to enjoy the Fruits of his Victories at Constantinople; 'till in the fifth Year of his Reign he was forc'd upon an Expedition against the Scythians, who having past the

A. D. 1122. Ister had wasted Thrace, and like devouring Locusts destroy'd all before 'em. Against these the Emperor led the Flower of the Roman Army, preparing however to circumvent by Fraud if possible, rather than engage with such a Multitude of Barbarians in a pitch'd Battel. Accordingly he sent his Ambassadors to the chief Captains in their Army, for every Tribe, or Clan, had its particular Commander, and amus'd the most powerful among 'em so effectually with his fair Promises and magnificent Presents, that they were carelessly consulting among themselves on what Terms they should grant Peace to a Prince, who appear'd so willingly to pay for it; when the Emperor towards the Evening fell suddenly upon 'em, kill'd great Multitudes before they were able to defend themselves, and forc'd the rest, after a resolute Opposition, to fly, or yield themselves Prisoners.

This signal Victory was succeeded by another, obtain'd shortly after over the Triballi, or Servii, who having broke the League concluded with them, provok'd the Vengeance of the Roman Arms against 'em. These being likewise overcome by the Emperor, were either incorporated in his Legions, or transplanted to other Parts, where they were not so capable of doing Mischief for the future.

The perfidious Triballi being thus punish'd by this active Emperor, he was shortly after forc'd to turn his Victorious Arms against the Hunns, who upon some frivolous Pretences had invaded the Territories of the Empire. John, who thought it advisable to prevent and remove an Evil before it gain'd too much Head, forc'd 'em back over the Ister; and passing his own Army over that River, he carry'd the War into their own Country, where he took several of their strong Holds, obtain'd a considerable Booty, forc'd 'em to such a Peace as he thought fit to grant, and having secur'd the Frontiers, return'd in Triumph to Constantinople; where he had hardly return'd Thanks for his Success, shewn himself to his Subjects, and suffer'd his Soldiers to enjoy a short Refreshment, before new Attempts of his Enemies call'd him out to new Adventures.
for

The Turks, who had already seiz'd on so many considerable Branches of the Empire, still grasp'd at more; with confederate Forces they seiz'd on several of the Roman Cities in Galatia, in Cilicia, and other Places, which this warlike Emperor did not only recover, but forc'd 'em to yield up others they had injuriously detain'd, and did not desist 'till he had master'd all Armenia; he laid Siege to Baca and Anazarba, which he took, but was forc'd to rise from before Berrhæa in Syria, after which he took in other Places of Importance, and made a fruitless Expedition against Antioch, to which he laid Claim by Virtue of the Treaty concluded between his Father and the Princes of the Crusade: But Fowk, Earl of Anjou, who had lately succeeded Baldwin of Bruges in the Kingdom of Jerusalem, undertook the Defence of the Place, and the Protection of Raymond, the Earl of Poitier's Son, who had marry'd Constantia, Bohemond's Daughter, and by that means was esteem'd the lawful Prince of those Territories.

The Emperor, in his Return homewards, was happily reconcil'd to his Brother Isaac, who in the Beginning of his Reign had taken some Disgust, and withdrew to the Turks, among whom he liv'd, and advis'd 'em to direct their Incursions with the most probable Success. But shortly after, as the Romans were about to engage the Turks near Neo-Cæsaria, Isaac's Son John, an arrogant intractable Youth, deserted to the Enemy, which had like to have prov'd the Destruction of the Roman Army; for he inform'd the Barbarians of the Difficulties they labour'd under, how their Horses dy'd daily, and that there was a Scarcity of all things convenient in their Camp; and that he might add a greater Weight

Weight to his Information, he impiously renounc'd the Christian Religion, and embrac'd the Mahometan Superstitions. The Turks were so encourag'd by this Defection, that they fell violently upon the Romans as they were decamping, and kill'd great Numbers before the Emperor could lead 'em into a Place of Security.

After this he return'd to Constantinople, where he was receiv'd with the usual Acclamations by the Citizens, who however murmur'd frequently at the heavy Impositions laid upon 'em for the Support of the War; but considering the Money was entirely apply'd for the Good and Security of the Publick, and not diverted to any private Use, they grew asham'd of their Uneasiness, and admir'd the indefatigable Industry of their Warlike Emperor, whose Care for the Good of his Subjects was more extensive than his Dominions, and who thought it a Shame to lye idle at home, when the Season of the Year suffer'd him to be at the Head of his Armies abroad.

Hitherto the many Wars he had been engag'd in concluded all honourably, and most of 'em advantageously to the Empire, and he had no great reason to accuse Fortune; but now she who had so long attended him in all his Expeditions as a Friend, began to declare against him. Tho' he had frequently attempted Antioch in vain, as has been before observ'd, and was oblig'd to come to an Agreement with the Latins there, yet his Ambition still prompted him to endeavour the Conquest of that renown'd City, which had formerly appear'd like an inestimable Diamond in the Crowns of his Predecessors. Having settled his Domestick Affairs he set forward in the Spring, accompany'd by his three Sons, Alexius, Andronicus, and Manuel, pretending publickly that the Design of his Expedition was only to settle the Affairs of Armenia, to secure his Conquests there, and confirm the Cities in their Obedience; tho' his Principal

A. D.
1140.

cipal Design was, if possible, to reunite Antioch to the Empire. How much Divine Providence was offended at his Undertaking, appear'd from the great Loss this Emperor sustain'd shortly after he had begun his March. For his eldest Son Alexius, whom he had before adorn'd with the Imperial Purple, dy'd by the way; and Andronicus, his second, had hardly perform'd the last Office to his deceas'd Brother before he follow'd, to the exceeding great regret of the Emperor, who was ready to sink under the weight of so unexpected a Calamity. However, being in nothing diverted from his intended Designs, he proceeded first into Isauria, and from thence into Syria, having first acquainted the Inhabitants of Antioch of his Arrival. The Citizens immediately sent an Embassy to congratulate his Presence in those Parts, with which he seem'd highly delighted, and promis'd himself an agreeable Success; but as he drew nearer he found he had great Reason to distrust the Integrity of the Latins, who understanding the Design of his Expedition, refus'd to admit him into the City 'till he had solemnly sworn he would attempt no Innovation, but quietly depart after a short Residence among 'em. The Emperor having first try'd the Temper of the Syrians and Cilicians, and found 'em by no means inclinable to a Change, were forc'd to submit; so that after he had taken the Oath prescrib'd, he and a few of his Followers was receiv'd into the City, but he was so ill pleas'd with his Entertainment there, and the Obstinacy of the Inhabitants, who had extorted that Oath from him, that at his Departure he order'd his Soldiers to plunder the Suburbs, which he pretended was done through the want of Provisions in the Army, though it was really contriv'd to revenge the Affront he thought they had put upon him. After this he directed his March towards the Confines of Cilicia, where he severely paid for the Outrages committed at Antioch. For as he was one Day Hunting a Wild Boar, having wounded him with his Spear, the enrag'd

The Emperor wounded mortally.

enrag'd Beast bore forward upon the Weapon with all his Strength, and forc'd the Emperor's Hand back upon the Point of a poison'd Arrow, which hung in a Quiver at his Back, and gave him a slight Wound, of which he shortly after dy'd; for whereas at first proper Remedies were not apply'd, the Strength of the Poison prevail'd by degrees, and caus'd such a Swelling in his Hand and Arm, that at length the Physicians declar'd there was no Remedy left but to cut off his Arm; this the Emperor peremptorily refus'd, affirming, that he wanted both Hands to govern so large an Empire.

A. D.
1142.

His Speech
before his Death.

Wherefore finding that Death was unavoidable, he sent for his Son Manuel, and having summon'd the chief of the Nobility to be present, he recounted to 'em the Condition he found the Empire in at his Father's Death, and in what a flourishing State he now left it. He represented to 'em his many Expeditions, his laborious Marches, and Victories obtain'd over such as had, for a long time before, reflected on the Roman Arms with Contempt. He told 'em he was now call'd to the Enjoyment of an Heavenly Kingdom, and wish'd 'em to consider of a Successor. He added, that he had two Sons living, Isaac and Manuel, and that if it might be lawful for him to name the Person he would have to succeed him, he would not so much consider the Priority of Birth, as the Superiority of Virtues, nor would he willingly leave the Empire to the oldest, but the most deserving. He observ'd, that God was no Acceptor of Persons, that the Dictates of Nature, like the Councils of Old Women, were often to be rejected in things of Moment and Consequence. After that he proceeded to recount the different Tempers of Isaac and Manuel, that this was of a sedate modest Disposition, and therefore the fitter to listen to, and receive the wholesome Advice of his Friends; that on the contrary the other was fiery and impatient; and having appear'd incapable of Obedience he judg'd him unworthy to Command; that Manuel from his Youth seem'd design'd for the Roman Empire, that several notorious Prophecies and Omens declaring

Declares
his Successor,

the

the Divine Pleasure had mark'd out his way to it, and therefore that as Isaac formerly conferr'd the Birth-Right on the younger, so he now thought it became him to call the younger to the Succession.

Isaac was by no means gracious to the People, and was moreover at this time absent from the Army, so that they all readily agreed to receive Manuel from the Hands of their dying Emperor, and was accordingly proclaim'd and acknowledg'd such at the Head of all the Legions, the chief Officers of the Army obliging themselves by most solemn Oaths, never to obey any other. This was chiefly attributed to the prudent Management of Axuchus, who thought by this means, to put a stop to the Troubles that might otherwise hereafter arise from different Pretenders.

Manuel
Comne-
nus.

The remaining Part of the Emperor's Time was spent in his Exhortations to Manuel, and his private Devotions: He liv'd not long after, but dy'd on the eighth of April, in the twenty fifth Year of his Reign, the fifth of Conrade the Third Emperor of Germany, and seventh of our King Stephen, A. D. 1142. He was a Prince equally to be admir'd for his private Deportment as a Man, and his publick Administration as Emperor, belov'd by the People for his frequent Donatives and magnificent Buildings. His Thirst after Glory was his most prevailing Quality, desiring above all things to continue his Name down to Posterity. He was an exact Observer of Forms in his Family and Habit, suffering no wanton Discourses in Court, no gaudy Dresses, nor riotous Banquets. As he was a sincere lover of Virtue himself, so he endeavour'd by his Example to encourage it in others. He was naturally Courteous, and free of Access, indulging himself in all sorts of innocent Recreations and Entertainments when the Affairs of State would permit. It is observable of him, that he put none to Death, nor inflicted a Corporal Punishment on any one throughout his whole Reign. So that he was deservedly and dies.

His Cha-
racter.

lovedly belov'd after his Death, and esteem'd an Ornament to the Comnenian Family, equalling most, and excelling not a few of his Predecessors.

Manuel's first Care, after his Father's Death, was to confirm himself in the Dignity to which he had been advanc'd. He was afraid lest his Brother Isaac, who was then at Constantinople, should upon the first notice of his Advancement declare against him, to which he thought the Imperial Treasure and Ornaments were no small Inducements. He therefore immediately sent away Axuchus, who had Orders to secure Isaac, if possible, before he had time to attempt any Alterations; in which that faithful Minister succeeded so effectually, that he suddenly seiz'd on the unregarded Prince, and shut him up into a Monastery, where he in vain exclaim'd against the Injustice he had receiv'd, and declar'd his Right to the Empire; whilst Axuchus was intent upon settling the Affairs at Court, upon reconciling the Minds of the People to the new Emperor, and preparing for his publick Entry, which he made amidst the loud Acclamations of the Inhabitants, who receiv'd him joyfully, both for his Father's sake, and the Reputation he had acquir'd for his own Valour, Prudence and Bravery. He had a lively Countenance, a manly Stature, and a Complexion rather Swarthy than Fair, but what was very becoming; and the Citizens at that time discover'd several imaginary Graces in his Person, which had before pass'd unobserv'd. Being Crown'd by the Hands of the Patriarch, and reconcil'd to his Brother Isaac, who promis'd an implicit Obedience for the future, he turn'd his Eyes towards the East, where the Turks renew'd their Inroads, and Raimond, Prince of Antioch, encroach'd upon the Roman Territories in Cilicia. Andronicus and Prusuchus were sent to observe Raimond, and the Emperor march'd in Person against the Infidels, from whom he recover'd such Places as they had seiz'd in Phrygia, and other Parts, and engaging with 'em at Philomeli-

um he receiv'd a Wound in his Foot; notwithstanding which he continu'd the War, and fate down before Iconium it self, from whence however he was shortly after forc'd to rise, and return in a disorderly manner home, where he began by some unworthy Actions, to render himself unacceptable to the People. He had marry'd Gertrude, Sister-in-Law to Conrade the German Emperor, who was not so careful by artificial transitory Beauties to adorn her Body, as by solid Virtues to enrich her Mind; which alienated the Affections of the youthful Emperor from her, who continu'd to her her Guards, and the other usual Ensigns of Empire, but abstain'd from her Bed, and wantonly convers'd with his own Niece Theodora, to the great Scandal of his Dignity and Profession.

The Greek Writers call her Eirene.

Manuel's Administration disagreeable to the People.

Knowing how much such an Action would raise the Indignation of his Subjects against him, he endeavour'd to soften 'em by his continu'd Application to the Affairs of State, by his Choice of such Ministers as he knew were acceptable to the People, and by his great Charity, Affability, and Magnificence, which however in time degenerated into the most sordid Parsimony and Austerity.

About this Time Ambassadors arriv'd at Constantinople from the German Emperor, and such other Princes as had undertaken the Second Crusade to the Holy-Land. Their Business was to desire in their Masters Name a free Passage for their Troops through the Territories of the Empire, with a supply of Forage and Provision. The Emperor, tho' he was infinitely jealous, receiv'd the Ambassadors tolerably well, extoll'd that generous and most Christian Temper in their Masters, and promis'd 'em a Sufficiency of all things they could desire, provided they insulted none of his Subjects in their Passage. Notwithstanding this fair Answer he muster'd all his Forces, and in a set Speech told his chief Officers how much reason he had to distrust the Western Christians, who he fear'd would appear Wolves

A. D. 1147.

Wolves in Sheeps Cloathing. He represented to 'em the Numbers and Inclinations of these Adventurers, that they were perfidious, cruel, and revengeful; that they usually made War before they had declar'd it; and seem'd by his Speech, rather to animate the Minds of his Soldiers for an Engagement with their Enemies, than to prepare 'em for a friendly Reception of their Fellow-Christians, who had arm'd themselves for no other purpose, but to drive the implacable Infidels farther from their Doors.

His treacherous behaviour to the Western Princes.

When he had thus deliver'd himself to the Army, he dismiss'd part of it to meet the Emperor, not so much out of Respect or Honour, as to observe his Motions, and the rest he retain'd for the Defence of the City, which he secur'd with new Fortifications, and behav'd himself as one who expected to be besieg'd by his Enemies, and not visited by his Friends. Those he had sent out to attend the Emperor Conrade, carry'd with them that Spirit he had instill'd into 'em; for they omitted no Opportunity of incommoding the Germans in their March, so that frequent Differences arose between 'em, which often ended in Blows, and Blood was drawn on both sides. The Emperor had commanded 'em to dispose themselves in Ambuscades on both sides of the Army in their March, and to kill, as they did without Mercy, such as straggled never so little from the Body of the Army, which for that Reason, not being able to march at any Compass, suffer'd extreamly for want of Provisions; and when the Greeks, by the Emperor's Permission, sold any to the necessitous Germans, they first mingled Quick-lime among the Flower, which was to make Bread for the Soldiers, who being extream hungry had not time to discover the cruel Cheat, by which means a strange Mortality rag'd among 'em. But this was not all; the Gates of all the Towns in their Passage were by the Emperor's Order shut against 'em, and when they went to buy their Victuals from the Inhabitants upon the

the Walls, they were first oblig'd to send their Money up in Baskets let down for that purpose, which when the treacherous Villains had receiv'd, they return'd only Derision instead of Commodities in Exchange for their Silver. In a Word, there was no Villany omitted, which either the Emperor himself did not act against 'em, or committed to the Conduct of others; that thereby their Posterity might for ever hereafter be deterr'd from invading the Territories of the Empire.

And that nothing might be wanting to compleat the Ruin of an Army, which otherwise might easily have triumph'd over all the East, Manuel, so soon as he understood what Preparations were making for this second Crusade, secretly acquainted Mamut, the Nephew of Solyman, Sultan of Iconium, with it, and press'd him vigorously to take up Arms against this Army of the Crusades which he was like to have upon his Hands; whereupon the Sultan immediately sent to all the Princes of his Nation to join in Defence of their common Interest against the Christians, and before one could well think it possible, had a most formidable Army rais'd, and sent to his Assistance.

By these Artifices Manuel effected the Ruin of an Army, which might otherwise have been invincible, whereby he has render'd his Name odious to all Posterity; and was in some measure punish'd by a War which about that time broke out between him and Roger, King of Sicily. That Prince, preserving the hereditary Aversion his Family had conceiv'd against that of Manuel, omitted no Opportunities of annoying the Emperor. Wherefore taking the Advantage of some Discontents among the Inhabitants of Corcyra, who thought themselves oppress'd by too heavy Exactions, he first seiz'd on that, and then coasting along without Control, he took Corinth, Thebes, and most of the principal Towns in Bæotia, which he plunder'd, and dividing

*His Wars
with Roger King of Sicily.*

part of the Spoil among his Soldiers, return'd laden home with the rest.

Manuel was at once afflicted and provok'd at these Proceedings, and breathing nothing but Revenge, declar'd War against the Sicilians. Accordingly he collected all the Standing Forces of the Empire into one Body, rais'd new Levies both of Horse and Foot, mann'd out a formidable Fleet, invited the Venetians into his Assistance, and declar'd Stephen and Axuchus Generals in chief against Roger: tho' he follow'd shortly after in Person, knowing how much his Presence would animate the Soldiers, and began the War with the Siege of Corcyra, or Corfu, the chief Town in the Island so nam'd. Here observing the strong Situation of the Place, that it was secured with strong Walls, and those Walls defended with convenient Towers, he was enrag'd at the Treachery of his Men, who suffer'd it to fall with so much Ease into the Hands of Roger. At first he summon'd the Garrison to surrender, who answering him no otherwise than with Showers of Arrows from the Walls, he gave Orders for an Assault, which was push'd on with great Bravery by the Romans, 'till having lost great Numbers of their Men, and Stephen their General among the rest, they were oblig'd to retire. Shortly after the Romans renew'd the Attack, in which the Emperor lost four hundred of the best Men in his Army, which Calamity was succeeded by another of a more fatal Consequence; for tho' Manuel had from the Beginning taken all necessary Precautions to prevent any Misunderstanding between the Romans and his Auxiliary Venetians, yet there arose between 'em an unhappy Quarrel, which beginning in some trivial Disputes, ended at length in Blood; for when Axuchus found the Venetians would not be brought to Reason by fair Means, he drew out the Roman Guards against 'em, and drove 'em to their Ships; whither when they were forc'd, after much Slaughter

Slaughter on both Sides, they renewed the Fight by Sea, and having burnt several of the Emperor's Ships, they seiz'd on the Admiral, on board of which they adorn'd a profligate Black with the Imperial Ornaments, and with a mock Solemnity saluted him Emperor, in Derision of Manuel, who, as we observ'd before, was of a swarthy Complexion. Tho' the Emperor was highly provok'd at this Indignity, yet dreading the Effects of a popular Commotion, and with a wonderful Dissimulation concealing his Resentments for the present, he sent some of their Nation, who had the Honour to be employ'd near his own Person, with Offers of an Accommodation, and Promises of Forgiveness for what was past, provided they would return to a Participation of the War, and once more unite their Arms with his against him he call'd their common Enemy. By this prudent Condescension a Pacification was effected, the Siege renew'd, and the Town assaulted both by Sea and Land; 'till the Besieg'd, who had made a vigorous Defence so long as they conceiv'd any Hopes of Relief, but despairing now of Roger's Assistance, surrender'd upon honourable Conditions, and some of 'em entring into the Emperor's Pay, among whom was Theodorus Capellanus, who had been their Governor, the rest return'd into Sicily.

The Emperor leaving a strong Garrison in the Town, which he found now to be of so considerable a Consequence, prepar'd to carry the War into Sicily it self, but was overtaken by a Storm, which disperst his Fleet, sunk several of his Ships, and suffer'd himself and the Transports to escape with great Difficulty to Aulon, from whence he march'd with some of the choicest Troops of his Army against the Servians, who taking their Advantage from the present Troubles, had infested the neighbouring Provinces of the Empire, and committed the Prosecution of the Sicilian War to the Conduct of Michael Palæologus, who by the Emperor's Order went to Venice, where he rais'd Recruits for his Army; with which he march'd into Calabria, by the Advice of Alexander, Roger's Kinsman, who having been disoblig'd by the King revolted to the Romans, and perswaded 'em to translate the War into his own Country, where he frequently defeated Roger's Forces, took several Towns, and sent great Numbers of Captives to the Emperor; who in the mean time pressing hard upon the Servians, they summon'd the Hungarians to their Assistance, and for some time made a tolerable Resistance; but being at length overthrown, Manuel carry'd the War into Hungary, where he raz'd several of their Cities, and return'd with a great Booty to Constantinople: From whence he shortly after made another Expedition against 'em, but upon Submission granted 'em a Peace; which however was of no long Continuance, for they were accus'd of favouring Andronicus Comnenus's Designs upon the Empire, whereupon the War commenc'd, and was manag'd for a considerable time with various Fortune on both sides.

Andronicus's ambitious Designs.

Andronicus, of whom we shall have Occasion to say more hereafter, was Cousin-German to the Emperor, and being a Man of an haughty aspiring Temper, had for a long time privately affected the Empire; of which Manuel was sufficiently sensible, but having no plain Proofs against him, he rather chose narrowly to observe than openly to punish him: But being now justly provok'd at him for his Practices with the Hungarians and other States, and incens'd against him by all his Relations, for his incestuous Conversation with Eudocia, the Emperor's Niece, he committed him to close Custody; hoping by the Inconveniences of a severe Restraint to break his intractable Mind, and teach him his Duty. But Andronicus's Obstinacy was invincible; he was so far from learning the Lesson his Calamities ought to have taught taught him, that his whole Thoughts were bent upon his Escape, which would make him capable of declaring himself more openly against the Emperor: And tho' he effected it shortly after, yet he was presently taken again, and more severely handled than before; 'till a forc'd Submission reconcil'd him for the present to the Emperor, tho' in the Issue he made it appear that he was of a Nature not to be oblig'd, as shall be shown in its proper Place.

In the mean time Manuel having by the Pope's Intervention, concluded a Peace with Roger, and in a great measure check'd the unquiet Hungarians, took a Progress into the East; and marching through Armenia arriv'd at Antioch, where the Inhabitants receiv'd him openly with much Respect, yet they beheld him with an unfriendly and jealous Eye. The Design of this Expedition was rather to show himself to the Eastern Provinces, than affect any thing material there; for having continu'd some time at Antioch, where he was entertain'd with Shows and Festivals, he return'd to Constantinople; but was assaulted by the Turks in his Passage, who kill'd several of his Men, and took part of his Equipage.

A. D.
1162.
Manuel at Antioch.

Being arriv'd at Constantinople, and angry at the late Behaviour of the Turks, he began to reflect on the Posture of their Affairs in Asia minor, where they still maintain'd their Dominion, tho' not so extensive as it had been formerly: For a War breaking out between Solyman's Successor, and Musat, Sultan of Iconium, it serv'd very much to the weakening of their Nation. This happen'd in the Reign of the late Emperor, who assisting the one against the other, was in the end deceiv'd by both. But Musat in time getting the whole Kingdom of the Turks into his Hands, at his Death divided it among his three Sons; to Clisasthan his Eldest he bequeath'd Iconium, the Metropolis, with all its Dependances; to Jagupasan his Second, or rather his Son-in-Law, he gave Amasia, Ancyra, with the fruitful Country of Cappadocia, and the adjacent

His Behaviour towards the Turks.

Territories; but the rich Cities of Cæsaria and Sebastia he allotted to Dadun's his Youngest. These Brethren being thus in Possession of their Father's Kingdom, formerly belonging to the Roman Empire, fell out quickly among themselves; the Sultan of Iconium seeking the Destruction of Jagupasan, who was influenc'd by the same Thoughts against him. The Emperor in the mean time sat still as an idle Spectator, wishing the Destruction of both, and privately incens'd the one against the other, tho' at length he more openly favour'd Jagupasan, who by vertue of his Assistance overthrew his Brother, and obtain'd a memorable Victory over him; so that the Sultan, grown weary of the Quarrel, not only courted the Emperor's Favour by his Ambassadors, but went in Person to Constantinople, where he was honourably receiv'd, and treated with all the Magnificence imaginable.

Among other Entertainments contriv'd for the mutual Diversion of the two Princes, a busie Turk undertook to fly the Space of a Furlong by vertue of artificial Wings, and to take his Flight from the Top of the Tower which stood in the Hypodrome. The whole World were surpriz'd and intent upon so desperate an Undertaking, the Emperor himself dissuading him from it, and the Sultan doubtful of the Event. The Time appointed being come, the Undertaker appear'd on the Turret, having a large white Garment on, gather'd into many Foldings for the better Reception of the Wind; and having for some time suspended the Expectation of the Beholders, who derided him, and provok'd him at length to perform what he had so unadvisedly promis'd, he hover'd a while with his Arms, as Birds do with their Wings, the better to gather the Wind, and committed himself with his vain Hopes to the Air; but instead of mounting as he had promis'd, like Icarus of old, he tumbled headlong down with such a Force that he broke his Neck, his Arms, and Legs, with almost every Bone in his Body,

Body, to the great Satisfaction of the Citizens, who with an inhospitable Freedom jeer'd the Turks whenever they met 'em, for this extravagant Attempt of their Country-man; 'till the Emperor, who observ'd the Sultan to be inwardly displeas'd at their Insolence, commanded a Stop to be put to it.

After this, the Emperor, who was willing to make the Sultan Witness of his prodigious Wealth, shew'd him his Treasury, and gratify'd him with so many Royal Presents, that the Turks pretended he knew not which to admire most, the abundant Riches or magnificent Liberality of the Emperor. In Token of Thankfulness he embrac'd Manuel, call'd him Father, and promis'd at his Return to drive Dadunes out of Sebastia, and restore it to the Emperor. Part of this Promise he carefully observ'd, for being return'd to Iconium he rais'd an Army with which he drove Dadunes out of Sebastia, and having seiz'd on the Dominions of Jagupasan, who dy'd at the Beginning of the War, and by that means render'd himself Master of all the Turks held in Asia minor, he forgot all former Courtesies; and seeing himself at the Head of a powerful Empire, he invaded Manuel's Territories, from whom he took Laodicea in Phrygia, with the adjacent Territories, plundering and destroying all that lay before him, killing the most resolute, and leading the rest into Captivity.

Manuel, who thought at first he had oblig'd a Friend, found now on the contrary that he had arm'd an Enemy against him; wherefore, to repress the Outrages of the perfidious Turks, he pass'd with a powerful Army over into Asia, where finding the Barbarians rov'd up and down at their Pleasure, he thought fit to fortifie Dorylaeum, the better to restrain their Incursions; and that his Soldiers might with more Chearfulness undertake the Work, he carry'd the first Basket of Stones himself, which serv'd as an Example to the rest, so that in a short time the City was defended with strong Walls and deep Ditches, maugre all the Opposition of the Turks, who continually alarm'd the Romans, and endeavour'd to drive 'em from their Works. With the like Care and Industry he fortify'd Subleum, another strong Hold, and having left sufficient Garrisons in both, he return'd to Constantinople. These Garrisons very much gaul'd the Turks, notwithstanding which they continu'd their Hostilities and Incroachments upon the Borders. This oblig'd the Emperor to expostulate with the Sultan, to remind him of the great Benefits he had receiv'd from him, and to reprove him for his Ungratitude. These Complaints of the Emperor were answer'd by Complaints as earnestly urg'd from the Sultan, who vehemently upbraided Manuel for his Unconstancy, and Breach of Promise, but insisted on nothing so much as his fortifying those Places, contrary, as he said, to the League between 'em.

This Disposition in the two Princes, and their mutual Remonstrances, were look'd upon as the Preludes of an ensuing War; for they were both Men of Resolution, impatient of Injuries, and revengeful. The Sultan was more cautious and circumspect, managing all by his Lieutenants; the Emperor more fiery, open, and adventurous, being the first to restrain the Encroachments of his Neighbours, and fighting in Person at the Head of his Armies: And now finding the Sultan was not to be oblig'd by fair means, he rais'd such an Army, consisting of Latins and Scythians as well as of his own Subjects, as if he intended not only to revenge the Affronts he had receiv'd from the present Sultan, but to call him to an Account for all the Injuries his Predecessors and the Roman Empire had sustain'd from the whole Nation, which he prepar'd utterly to extirpate.

With these Thoughts, and at the Head of his numerous Forces, the angry Emperor pass'd over into Asia, directing his Marches with much Care and Circumspection, for fear of any sudden Attempt from the Barbarians, and drawing a Trench wherever he lodg'd his Army. The Turks in the mean time showing themselves in small Parties, and watching their Advantages, insulted sometimes one Part of the Army, and sometimes the other, destroying the Forage, and infecting the Water, where-ever they knew the Emperor was to pass; which exceedingly incommoded the Romans, who dy'd daily of the Flux.

froms

In the mean time the Sultan, having receiv'd a powerful Assistance from the Persians, thought fit, before he had Recourse to the Extremities of War, to try the Emperor by his Ambassadors, who demanded a Peace of him, and that upon such Terms as he himself should think fit to grant. This made Manuel to summon a Council of War, in which they who were the most experienc'd in the Wars advis'd that the Sultan's Offers ought to be embraced, that an honourable Peace ought to be preferr'd to the Dangers and Uncertainties of War, as consisting more with the Emperor's own Honour, and the Safety of the Empire. In this they were with great Vehemence oppos'd by the young unskiful Courtiers, who having hardly ever heard the Sound of a Trumpet, but push'd on by a false ill-grounded Courage, declar'd aloud for the War; to whom the unfortunate Emperor adher'd, and dismiss'd the Ambassadors with a surly arrogant Answer: And when the Sultan once more courted him to a Peace, he made no other Reply, but that he would come and let him know his Pleasure at Iconium.

Manuel's Indiscreti-
on

The Sultan, perceiving the Emperor deaf to all Motions of a Reconciliation, seiz'd on the Straits of Zibrica, through which the Romans were to pass in their Removal from Myriocephalon, an old ruinous Castle, and of a Name ominous to the Romans, as it appear'd afterwards by the Event. The Entrance into these Straits was by a long Valley, flank'd on each Side by high Mountains and craggy Rocks, which at once afforded afforded a painful and amazing Passage to the Traveller.

In an inauspicious Hour the desperate Emperor enter'd this Valley, having neither provided for the clearing of the Passages, nor Safety of the Carriages, but marching as through a plain and open Country, tho' he had been assur'd before that the Turks were strongly possess'd both of the Straits and Mountains, in order to dispute his Passage. So that the Romans were no sooner enter'd, but the Turks poured deadly Showers of Arrows upon 'em from the Mountains and broken Cliffs, which did the Execution they desired. However they of the Van-guard casting themselves into the Form of a Wedge, and having join'd their Targets in the manner of a Pent-house close over their Heads, by degrees drove the Turks out of those Straits, and forc'd 'em farther up into the Mountains; and having recover'd the Top of a Hill they there encamp'd themselves, waiting for the rest to join 'em.

occasions
the Loss of
his Army.

In this manner the whole Army might probably have pass'd, had they not been encumber'd by their Carriages, which lengthen'd their March, and gave the Turks time to fall like a Torrent upon 'em from the Mountains, which put 'em into the greatest Confusion; for being continually press'd by the growing Multitudes of their Enemies, who had the Advantage of the Ground against 'em, they were by degrees hemm'd in on every side, and had not Power left either to retreat or advance, but fell a Sacrifice to the Emperor's Indiscretion, and the Fury of the Barbarians. The Slaughter was so great, that the Vallies were in a manner cramm'd with dead Bodies, and the Rivers overflow'd with Blood. Men and Beasts, Christians and Turks, the Valiant and the Coward, lay together in promiscuous Heaps; for during the Action a violent Wind rais'd the Sand of that desert Country as into a thick Darknes, so that both Sides fought with an undistinguishing Fury, killing Friend and Foe in that horrible Confusion. The Emperor, whose Courage was equal to his Folly, seeing the Day irrecoverably lost, forc'd his Way, with such as had the Boldness to follow him, through the thickest Ranks of his Enemies, and bore off with him the visible Marks of the Danger he had escaped. Being thus disingag'd, he mov'd directly towards the Vanguard of his Army, and observ'd sometimes as he pass'd along some of his own Subjects and most intimate Friends beset and overpower'd by the prevailing Turks, without being able to stay and relieve 'em; at others he was forc'd to ride over the Bodies of his nearest Relations, either dead or dying, who with a dumb Horror severely reproach'd him for his fatal Indiscretion. However at length, with much Difficulty, he escap'd to the advanc'd Legions; where wounded, weary, and ready to faint for Thirst, he commanded Water to be brought him from a neighbouring Stream, which when he had tasted, and perceiving it to be infected, with a deep Sigh he said, How unfortunately have I tasted of Christian Blood; to which a mutinous Soldier, who overheard him, instantly reply'd, This is not the first Time, O Emperor, thou hast drunk the Blood of Christians, but didst even then drink of it to an Intoxication, when first by thy cruel Exactions thou didst oppress and devour thy needy Subjects. Tho' this reproachful Speech imbitter'd the Sense of his present Calamities, yet knowing how justly he had deserv'd it, he pass'd it by in Silence, as if he had not heard it.

killing

Shortly after this, Andronicus Contostephanus, and such other Officers as had commanded in the Rear, and escap'd the Fury of the Turks, came up to the Emperor; and he had now time to reflect on the many Brave Men he had lost, and the Danger he was in. Among the slain were reckon'd Baldwin the Emperor's second Wife Matilda's Brother, and Manuel's own Nephew Andronicus Bataza; who marching

ing with an Army out of Paphlagonia and Heraclea Pontica against the Turks in Amasia, was intercepted by the way, and slain. The Miseries of the Day were more than equall'd by the Horrors of the ensuing Night : The Christians were in a foreign hostile Country, encompass'd by their Enemies on all sides, who alarm'd every Quarter of their Camp, threatening, with an insolent Barbarity, to destroy 'em all at the Return of Day ; whereupon they began, whilst living, to number themselves among their dead Companions. No one drew a deeper Draught of this sorrowful Cup than the Emperor, who being himself the Occasion of all these Calamities, had a double Portion : Having called the Chief Officers together, after some Deliberation he told 'em, he was resolv'd to fly and secure himself, and advis'd 'em to shift for themselves in the best manner they could. Which infamous Resolution being by chance overheard by the Soldier before mention'd, who stood then at the Tent Door, he ask'd him in a reproachful manner, If it was not he who had led 'em into those Dangers, and to such invincible Necessities ? Had they more reason to complain of the Barbarians, or him, who had brought 'em into that Vale of Miseries and Mouth of Hell ; and would he now betray 'em by a shameful Flight, and leave 'em as Sheep design'd for the Slaughter ? The Emperor was touch'd to the Quick with this severe Reprehension, and therefore laying aside all Thoughts but of Fighting, he resolv'd to expect the worst ; tho' his Enemies on every side were ready to devour him ; Help he saw none at hand, and nothing remain'd but Death and Despair.

An unexpected Deliverance.

Whilst Manuel labour'd under these Agonies, Divine Providence touch'd the Sultan's Heart with an unwonted Tendernefs and Pity to distress'd Majesty. He, having recall'd the Turks, who by Break of Day began to assault the Camp, presented the Emperor, by the Hands of Gabras, a Man of greatest

Autho-

Authority next himself, with a Horse richly caparison'd, and a Sword of an inestimable Value. These Presents were attended with Proposals for a Peace upon such Terms as the Emperor, in that Exigency of his Affairs, could not reject. Whilst Gabras was, in an eloquent Speech, at once comforting the Emperor for his present Misfortunes, and recommending to him the Study of Peace, he observ'd a rich yellow Robe which the Emperor wore over his Armor, and concluded with telling him that Colour was not proper for a Soldier, but was ominous and portended ill Luck; at which the Emperor with a Smile gave it him, and receiving the Presents sent him from the Sultan, sign'd the Peace: Which being thus concluded beyond all Mens Expectations, Manuel prepar'd to march home, desiring to return another Way than that by which he came, on purpose to avoid offending his Eyes with the Sight of those he had lost in the Straits; but his Guides, either through Design or Necessity, conducted him back the same Way, where he could not but behold the lamentable Effects of his late Overthrow: The Straits were fill'd up, the Vallies rais'd into Hills, and the Forests lay cover'd with the Carcasses of the Slain: Every Man, as he past by, call'd with a doleful Voice upon his Friends and Acquaintance, whom he had lost; and they were all so touch'd with that inexpressible Scene of Woe, that they once more seem'd to be surrounded by the merciless Turks, and again to repeat those Dangers they had lately with so much Difficulty escap'd.

Having at length pass'd those doleful Straits, the Turks appear'd again in their Rear; for the Sultan, repenting that he had suffer'd the Prey to escape out of his Hands, gave leave to such as would to pursue 'em, who slew many of 'em, especially of the Sick and Wounded, who could not keep up with the rest. After many Inconveniences, the Emperor re conducted the Army to Chonas, where he distributed buted Money among those that were wounded, and having discharg'd 'em proceeded forward to Philadelphia, where he staid some time to refresh himself, and attend the Cure of his Wounds.

Among other Conditions of the Peace, which the Emperor had oblig'd himself to observe, One was, That the Fortifications of Dorylæum and Subleum should be raz'd: This the Emperor, being now out of Danger, and considering the great Importance of those two Places, was very unwilling to perform; however he did it by halves, dismantling Subleum, but continuing Dorylæum in the same Condition it was in before the Wars; and when the Sultan exhorted him by his Ambassadors to a better Observance of the Treaty, he answer'd, That what had been extorted from him during his Necessities could be of no Force, and therefore refus'd a Compliance: At which the Sultan was so enrag'd, that he sent Atapacus, at the Head of twenty four thousand of his best Soldiers, to waste and destroy all the Provinces and Cities without Distinction down to the Sea-side, strictly commanding him, as a Proof of his Obedience, to bring him some of the Sea Water, an Oar, and some of the Sand. These Orders were executed with so much Resolution, that Atapachus immediately laid all Phrygia waste, sparing neither Man, Woman, nor Child; but as he was returning with a prodigious Booty, he was met in his Passage over the River Meander by some of the Emperor's Forces, who had been posted there for that purpose, and who cut him off together with his whole Army, and recover'd the Prey. The Turks were so dispirited by this Overthrow, that they grew less arrogant for the future, tho' they never observ'd any Peace, but watch'd all Opportunities for enlarging their Dominions.

Manuel having thus in some measure secur'd himself and the Empire from the Turks, was too jealous and active to enjoy long the Tranquility his late Dangers

had

had purchas'd. Frederick the First, surnam'd Barbarossa, was at that time Emperor of Germany, who having pacify'd the Affairs of that Country, and made the States of Italy submit to his Pleasure, appear'd as a dangerous Rival to the distrustful Manuel; who was sensible, that if any one Prince should become absolute in the West, he might easily insult the Eastern Empire, which had been so considerably weaken'd by the prevailing Power of the Barbarians. Of this he had been aware long before, and therefore maintain'd, at a vast Expence, his Pensioners in most of the Italian Courts, by which means there was scarce any thing transacted even in the Conclave of which he had not an Account. By his Munificence he had brought over the Venetians, Genoese, the Pisans, and the Inhabitants of Ancona to his Interest; and of those he made frequent use to embarrass Frederick's Affairs. Frederick, who was sensible of this Proceeding, knew not how to declare himself openly against Manuel, but sat down before Ancona, of which he pretended to be the Lord in chief, and which he knew was particularly inclin'd to the Eastern Emperor. The Siege lasted longer than was at first expected, and the Germans were at length forc'd to quit it, the Inhabitants undergoing with great Chearfulness all the Difficulties attending a Siege, to which they were encourag'd by Manuel's Ambassadors, who continu'd all the while within the Town.

We have nothing else considerable of this Emperor 'till his Death, except that, of an ill Emperor, he, in the latter End of his Reign, set up for a worse Manuel Divine; proceeding so far in the Heat of his Disputes, as to defend even some of Mahomet's Absurdities. This created great Divisions in the Church, whilst some adher'd to the Truth out of Conscience sake, and others, blinded by their Interest, implicitly follow'd the Emperor: But Death shortly after put an End to these Disputes, which he manag'd with so much Application.

He

A. D.
1180.

His Death,

He was taken ill in March, and tho' he dy'd not 'till the Month of September following, yet he could not be prevail'd upon all that while to settle the Affairs of State, and appoint a Guardian to his Son, who being young was incapable of governing himself. The Reason of this was, that confiding in judicial Astrology, he affirm'd he had fourteen Years of Life still remaining, during which he was to have the Pleasure of obtaining new Mistresses, and recovering several Towns from the Barbarians. But finding at length the approach of Death, and that it was irresistible, he renounc'd his former Vanities, and took the Habit of a Monk, the Sight of which drew Tears from his Assistants, in Consideration of the Imbecility of Human Affairs. He did not long survive this Change, but dy'd in the thirty sixth Year of his Reign, the twenty ninth of Frederick Barbarossa, the twenty sixth of Henry the Second, King of England, A. D. 1180.

and Character.

He was a Prince whose good and bad Qualities were so intermixt, that it was no easie thing to determine which had the Predominance. The Beginning of his Reign was so propitious, that he seem'd deservedly to enjoy that Dignity, which had been conferr'd on him in Prejudice to the Right of his Elder Brother. He was naturally brave, fearless, hardy, daring, and ready in the Execution of what he had undertaken. He delighted very much in War, and yet took little Care to encourage and reward Military Men, especially towards the latter End of his Reign, when he had the greatest need of 'em: And indeed he seem'd properly design'd for War, for in Times of Peace no Prince was ever more dissolute in all manner of Debauchees, which threw him upon Extravagances, that oblig'd him to oppress his Subjects with illegal Taxes, and most scandalous Impositions. He was remarkable for his Cruelty, which proceeded from his great Jealousie and Superstition. The most execrable of all his Qualities was his Perfidiousness, which made him

commit

commit the blackest and most horrid Crimes upon occasion of the second Crusade, and thereby render'd his Name eternally infamous to the whole Earth.

Manuel being dead, he was succeeded by his Son Alexius Comnenus, a Child of about twelve Years of Age, who had the Name of Emperor, but the Authority rested in his Mother, and such of his Father's Relations as she thought fit to trust; who govern'd the Empire no better than Phaeton is said to have guided the Chariot of the Sun; the young Prince in the mean time being suffer'd to indulge himself in his Pleasures, unable to discern what would contribute most to the Honour and Reputation of the Empire, or what would prove most prejudicial to it: Whilst they, who manag'd the Affairs, study'd nothing less than the Care of his Education, and follow'd every one his private Interest and particular Inclinations. Some, who were taken with the Beauty of the young Empress, for which she was worthily celebrated, made their Courtship to her, and spent their Time in Gallantries, and amorous Amusements; others enrich'd themselves out of the publick Treasury; and a third sort, who were the most dangerous, had greater Things in View, aiming at nothing less than the Empire it self.

Alexius
II.

The ill Management of the Ministry proves the Ruin of the young Emperor.

Whilst the Court was thus taken up, and no Regard was had to the publick Affairs, the Turks without any Resistance invaded the Frontiers, and took Suzopolis, with several other Towns in Phrygia, and daily encroach'd upon the Provinces of the Empire; this rais'd in the People a general Dislike to the present Government, and prepar'd 'em for any Innovation.

Among those who endeavour'd to gain the Affections of the Empress, no one succeeded so well as Alexius, at that time President of the Council, and nearly related to the Emperor, with whom he was thought to be more familiar than consist'd with her Honour, and that by her Assistance he hop'd to be advanc'd to the Imperial Dignity, which was judg'd no difficult matter to be effected in that Conjunction. At this the other Grandees of the Court were alarm'd, and highly resent'd the great Authority of Alexius, not out of any tender regard to the young Emperor, but a jealous Concern for their own Safety.

Andronicus, of whom mention has been made already, was quickly inform'd of these different Factions, and divided Interests at Court; having a long time affected the Purple, he was too sagacious not to think this the fittest Time to attempt the obtaining it. He was a Man of a haughty turbulent Spirit, and for that reason had liv'd either as a Prisoner or an Exile, during the greatest Part of the late Reign; residing at present at Oenæum, whither he had been confin'd for some new Attempts, by the late Emperor. He was a Man of great Address, and had highly recommended himself to the Commonalty, and some also among the Nobility, by his insinuating popular Behaviour. That which Manuel had design'd to curb and restrain him, he now made use of as a Step to ascend the Imperial Throne; there was one Clause, among many other Things in the Oath of Obedience, which the late Emperor had forc'd him to take to himself and his Son Alexius, whereby he was oblig'd to discover whatever he knew at any time contriv'd or attempted that was prejudicial to the Honour and Safety of their Persons, and with the utmost of his Power to oppose it. In Obedience to this Oath, as was pretended, he writ Letters full of Respect to the young Emperor; and Theodosius the Patriarch, in which having profess'd a profound Veneration for the Memory of the late Emperor, and an implicit Love and Obedience to the Person and Authority of the young Prince, he complain'd in high Terms of the unbounded Authority of the President, and his scandalous Familiarity with the Empress, so notorious, as he said, to the whole World. That this could not be suffer'd without a Violation of the Imperial Dignity, which he was bound by Oath to assert to the utmost, most, and to die rather than see the young Emperor in so notorious a manner insulted. These Letters had their desired Effect : Andronicus was consider'd as a Man of great Experience, and the only Person fit to reform the Abuses of State. Being inform'd by his Emissaries at Court of the Peoples Disposition towards him, he left Oeneum, and mov'd towards Constantinople ; declaring, where-ever he came, That he was marching in Obedience to the Oath made to the late Emperor, and to redeem Alexius out of the Hands of his Enemies, who like sensual Brutes fed upon the Fat of the Land. In this manner he came as far as Paphlagonia, being receiv'd by the People as their Deliverer and Defender ; for he had a Tongue so fluent, that he was able to convince the most obstinate, and soften the Barbarian : His Words were attended with Tears, which flow'd as it were from two Fountains, and commiserated the deplorable Condition of his Country, that call'd aloud for his Assistance. The Numbers of those Country People, that were by these Artifices drawn over to him in his March, were incredible, so that no one dare to oppose him 'till he came into Bitynia, where John Ducas, Governor of Nice, shut the Gates against him, as an Enemy of the State : The same Treatment he met with at Nicomedia ; notwithstanding which he continu'd his March, and having, near a Castle call'd Charace, defeated Andronicus Angelus, whom the President had sent out against him, he proceeded forward, encamp'd a little above Chalcedon, almost opposite, and in sight of Constantinople.

Andronicus marches towards Constantinople.

The Citizens were by this generally prepar'd for his Reception, courting him by Letters, and urging him to be speedy in the Execution of his just and honourable Designs ; for the President had so provok'd 'em by his Tyrannical Proceedings, his Arbitrary Exactions, and Cruel Oppressions, that he was universally detested by them ; particularly Mary, the young Emperor's Sister by the Mother's side, who was highly offended

A Sedition
in the City.

to see the vast Treasure, which her Royal Progenitors had been so long hoarding up, and the Empire itself become a Prey to the Ambition of one Man, and the Lust of a Woman, to whom she had always express'd an irreconcilable Aversion, stirr'd up the People against 'em, and rais'd a Sedition, which occasion'd the spilling of much Blood, and was with great Difficulty appeas'd. The President perceiving how unable he was to contend with Andronicus by Land, had in the mean time mann'd out the Imperial Fleet, which was committed to the Conduct of Contostephanus, who claim'd it as his Right, and was order'd to prevent Andronicus his Passage over the Bosphorus; but he, watching his Opportunity, revolted with the whole Fleet, which, being the greatest Stroke, determin'd the Fortune of the War, and secur'd to Andronicus all his Pretences. For now Alexius had no longer any Authority in the City, where the Citizens revil'd him to his Face, and with repeated Acclamations declar'd for Andronicus, the Guardian of the young Emperor, and Genius of the State. In the mean time John and Manuel, Andronicus his two Sons, whom the President had thrown into Prison, were set at Liberty, and the President himself, with those of his Faction, were clapp'd under a strong Guard 'till the Arrival of Andronicus, who was impatiently expected. Alexius himself, who but lately was attended by thousands, whom he could command with a Nod, and who was Emperor in every thing but the Name, was in a few Days after seated on a scurvy Jade, and with a Rag plac'd on the Top of a Reed in manner of an Ensign, carry'd before him, attended with the Scoffs and Execrations of the People, conducted to the Sea-side, and there thrown into a little Boat, which transported him to Andronicus, who having insulted him himself, and expos'd him to the severe Reprehensions of the Nobility about him, shortly after order'd his Eyes to be pluck'd out.

By this time all things having been manag'd and settled in the City, according to the Pleasure of Andronicus, he pass'd over, and was conducted into the City, attended with the Shouts and Acclamations of the People. The Emperor lay at that time with his Mother at a Royal Seat in the Country, which was done by Andronicus his Appointment, who, out of a pretended Respect to his Prince, went to wait on him first before he would be receiv'd into the City. Being come into his Presence he fell on the Ground, kiss'd his Feet, and wash'd 'em with his Tears, which he had ready at Command, as he had several Texts of Scripture, which he properly apply'd to the present purpose. He saluted the Empress with a Coldness that sufficiently express'd the Aversion he had to her.

Andronicus enters the City.

Having staid some Days with the Emperor, he then march'd into the Imperial City, where, among other things, he went with a pretended Devotion to visit the late Emperor Manuel's Grave, where he wept bitterly, roaring, as it were, with excess of Grief, to the great Admiration of those Spectators who were not acquainted with his great Talent of Dissimulation, and who therefore imputed it to the great Love he had for him, who had been his cruel Persecutor. When one of his Relations would have pull'd him from the Tomb, telling him he had indulg'd his Sorrows enough, he refus'd to be remov'd, urging that he had something in secret to say to the Dead. And accordingly, with his Hands lifted up, and his Eyes fix'd fast on the Tomb in the Posture of a Suppliant, he mov'd his Lips, and said something secretly, the Purport of which no Man can tell. Some said it was a Charm or Incantation, others, who were better acquainted with Andronicus, made a Speech for him, which they knew was more agreeable to his Temper, and which they compriz'd in Words like these. I have thee now fast, my most cruel Persecutor, by whom I have been so often Nicet. p. 166. Paris Edit.

driven to the last Extremity, an Outcast, and Wanderer upon the Face of the Earth. But now art thou confin'd to the Limits of this narrow Tomb, and lock'd fast in the Arms of Death, shalt arise no more 'till the last fatal Trump awake thee. Know thou that I will severely avenge my self upon thy Family, and, like a Lion possess'd of his Prey, will satiate my self with Blood, when once I have master'd this Imperial City.

His cruel
Behaviour.

Having receiv'd the Submission of the Citizens, and been acknowledg'd Protector of the Empire during the Minority of the young Alexius, he apply'd himself to the Management of the State, and recall'd to the Memory of that unhappy People the Days of old, and the Proscriptions of Marius, Sylla, and the rest, who, having trampled over the Liberties of their Country, dy'd their Swords in the Blood of their Fellow Citizens. Many were murder'd, others depriv'd of Sight, and great Multitudes thrown into Prison without any Cause assign'd, but the Will of the Tyrant, which proceeded either from some old Grudge, or for that they were of the Nobility, and wish'd well to Alexius. His Ears were open to all Accusations, so that if any Man had conceiv'd a Prejudice to his Neighbour, his ready way to be reveng'd was to accuse him of some pretended Crime to Andronicus. In this Confusion the Father spar'd not the Son, nor the Son the Father; the Brother labour'd for the Brother's Destruction, and it often happen'd that the Accuser and Accused shar'd in the common Fate.

The first who tasted of his Cruelty was Mary, the Daughter of the late Emperor, who tho' she had appear'd the most zealous to promote the Revolution, yet was she poison'd by the Tyrant's means, and her Husband is said to have tasted of the same Cup, and to have dy'd shortly after. The very Favours and Commendations of this Tyrant were fatal; for those whom he pretended most to esteem to Day, were sure to bleed to Morrow, so that they appear'd no other than than Victims deck'd out for the Altar, as if Death it self had not been sufficient unless it was aggravated by these Circumstances. As yet the Empress was suffer'd to be near her Son, but when the Tyrant had polluted the Streets of Constantinople with his Murders and Massacres, then he began to reflect how much she had oppos'd his Designs during the late Reign; and tho' there was no reason to think she would ever be capable of hurting him in this, yet he resolv'd to destroy her. Accordingly he exclaim'd publickly against her, call'd her Traitors, and a declar'd Enemy to the Emperor and the State, threatening once more to depart if she were not remov'd from her Son's Presence.

Tho' he would have done any thing sooner than that, yet the unthinking Multitude, who were still mis-led by a wonderful Opinion of him, flock'd in great Numbers to the Patriarch's House, and threaten'd to Mutiny if Andronicus was not oblig'd in that Point. Whereupon a Council was summon'd, consisting of such as, for the most part, were too complaisant to oppose the Tyrant's Pleasure. In this Council she was charg'd of Treason, as that she by Letters should invite Bela, King of Hungary, her Brother-in-Law, to invade the Empire. And that the Council might know before hand what they were to do, Leo Monasteriotes, Demetrius, Tornicius, and Constantinus Petrenus, who among others were summon'd to assist in it, were seiz'd by Order of Andronicus, and hardly escap'd the Fury of the Mob, for desiring to know Whether that Council was call'd by the Emperor's Consent and Approbation? The unhappy Empress was adjudg'd guilty of the Matters alleg'd against her; and she, who not long before was one of the greatest Princes of the East, and receiv'd a double Obedience from her Subjects, on account of her irresistible Charms and Imperial Power, was now reduc'd to the utmost Misery and Despair, deserted by her Friends, and scorn'd even of her Keepers. In this Condition she lay press strangled by Andronicus's Order,

The Em-

lay not long, for Andronicus, to compleat his Villany, commanded her shortly after to be strangled, and committed the Execution of it to Pterigionites the Eunuch, who was already stain'd with the Blood of Mary, and her Husband Manuel; Andronicus his own Son, and Georgius Augustus, having first refus'd so ungrateful an Office.

All this while the Tyrant express'd the tenderest Love to the young Emperor, whom he took care to have solemnly crown'd by the Patriarch, he assisting in Person with Tears in his Eyes, the Witnesses of his inward Joy, as he would have it thought, upon that Occasion; which made those that observ'd him, and were not yet acquainted with his bloody Hypocrisie, to think the young Prince exceeding happy in so faithful and loyal a Protector and Counsellor: But having by this time got both the Emperor and Empire in his Power, and remov'd all those whom he judg'd adverse to his Designs, he began more openly to declare himself. In a Council consisting chiefly of his own Favourites, he enlarg'd upon the present Dangers of the Empire, threaten'd at once with intestine Divisions and foreign Invasions, and requir'd their speedy Advice in so great an Exigency; they watching their Cue, affirm'd the Empire would be irrecoverably lost unless he was associated to Alexius, and by his great Wisdom and Experience divert the Storm, or teach the State to weather it; after which with one Voice they cry'd out, Long live Alexius and Andronicus, Roman Emperors! Which Acclamation was taken by others employ'd for that Purpose, and in a moment communicated through the whole City. The young Emperor himself seeming outwardly glad of so worthy a Companion, and congratulated him for his Advancement; whilst the crafty Tyrant affected an Aversion to what he had so long coveted, and unwillingly suffer'd 'em to place him in the Imperial Seat, and adorn him with the Purple; and being, as it was customary, at his Coronation to partake of
the

Androni-
cus.

A. D.

1182.

the Blessed Sacrament, having receiv'd the Bread, and taken the Blessed Cup in his Hand, with a Countenance devoutly fram'd, and his Eyes cast up to Heaven, he solemnly swore by those dreadful Myſteries that he had taken upon him the Fellowship of the Empire for no other End, but to aſſiſt Alexius, his Couſin, in the Government, and ſupport his Authority. A dreadful Imprecation and proper Introduction to what follow'd ſoon after, for after he had ſpent a few Days in his feign'd Devotions, in the miſt of which he ſecretly reſolv'd upon the Death of Alexius, he ſummon'd his Council, who had done ſo many great things for him already, wherein the Inconveniency of many Governours was diſcourſed of at large, and how much a ſingle Dominion was conſiſtent with the ſafety of the State, and that the Age of an old Eagle was more valuable than the Youth of a Lark. After which ſeaſonable Preparation, they decreed that Alexius ſhould be dethron'd; and as if that was not ſufficient, he was ſhortly after condemn'd to die; which abominable Sentence was accordingly executed by Stephanus Hagiochriſtophorites, and ſome others, who entering the unhappy Prince's Chamber by Night, without any Regard had to his Dignity, or Compaſſion for his Youth and Innocency, cruelly ſtrangled him with a Bow-ſtring; and Andronicus coming in ſhortly after, ſpurn'd the dead Body with his Foot, branding the Memory of his Father with Perjury, and of his Mother with Whoredom.

*who does the ſame by
the young
Emperor
Alexius.*

This was the unfortunate End of the young Emperor Alexius, who had not liv'd full fifteen Years, nor reign'd three, before he was cropt, like a Flower in the Bloom, by the execrable Hands of Treason and Parricide. And now Andronicus being Emperor without a Rival, as he poſſeſs'd his Predeceſſor's Dignity, ſo was he reſolv'd to enjoy his intended Bride; for tho' he was no leſs than threeſcore and ten Years of Age, yet he thought himſelf a fit Match for Ann, the French King's Daughter, whom he marry'd, tho' ſhe

she was no more than eleven Years old, and had before been betroth'd to Alexius.

Finding the People reproach'd him for the Breach of his Oath made to Manuel and Alexius, he by much Dexterity persuaded the Bishops to release and absolve him from it. For which presumptuous Absolution, those very Bishops, who had thereby exceeded their Commission, were shortly after punish'd by Andronicus himself, who contemn'd 'em as Men forgetful of their Duties and Calling.

A. D.
1184.
Andronicus being now sole Emperor his great Tyranny.

After this he apply'd himself without Intermiſſion to the Eſtabliſhment of his Power, ſparing neither Age, Sex, or Condition, where he conceiv'd he had reaſon to apprehend any Danger ; ſo that every Day was diſtinguiſh'd by the Execution of ſome brave Man or other, and Murders were grown ſo common, that they began to be unregarded. Some were depriv'd of their Sight, others hang'd, ſome poiſon'd, and not a few burnt alive : But that which aggravated theſe undeſerved Punishments was, that all the while the merciless Tyrant would pretend to be ſorry for 'em, and with Tears in his Eyes ſeem to blame the Severity of the Law, which would not ſuffer him to ſhow Mercy to ſo many, whom he thought brave Men. Nor did Andronicus rage only againſt ſuch as were near him at Conſtantinople, but extended his Cruelty to the remotest Provinces of the Empire ; ſo that all thoſe who were the leaſt inclinable to the Family of the Emperor Manuel, were forc'd to fly as from an enraged Lion, or an irrefiſtible Torrent that bore down all before it. Iſaac Comnenus, Manuel's near Kinfman, took Refuge in Cyprus, where he turn'd Tyrant himſelf, and is ſaid as much to have exceeded Andronicus in all manner of Barbarities, as Andronicus out-did the reſt of Mankind. Alexius Comnenus, Manuel's own own Brother, fled into Sicily, where he perſuaded William, the King of that Iſland, to declare War againſt Andronicus. The King landing at Dyrrachium took the City, and march'd from thence without without meeting any to oppose him, through the Heart of Macedonia, having order'd his Fleet to attend him at Theſſalonica, whither he led his Army, and won the City, rather through the Cowardice of the Governor, than the Courage of his own Troops. The Outrages the Sicilians committed in that Place were unspeakable, they not only thrust the Inhabitants out of their Habitations, and depriv'd 'em of their most valuable Substance, but stript 'em naked, exposing those Parts to publick View which by Nature were design'd to be conceal'd; and suffer'd 'em to starve in the Streets, whilst they revell'd in their Houses, devouring that in a Moment, which the parsimonious Industry of many Years had been purchasing: After which they spoil'd all the Country round about, and threaten'd the Imperial City it self. In this Extremity Andronicus sent out some in whom he could most confide against the Sicilians, who easily defeated the cowardly Græcians, and grew more formidable from so ineffectual an Opposition. This very much weaken'd the Authority of Andronicus at home, where the Number of the Malecontents encreas'd proportionable to the Success his Enemies met with abroad, and threw him upon more desperate Courses, if possible, than any he had recurr'd to before: For now he proscribed whole Families at once, and sometimes his own Favourites, who had hitherto been the Executioners of his Tyranny, were carry'd off in the general Destruction. Among others appointed to the Slaughter was Isaac Angelus, a Man of great Nobility, who was obnoxious upon no other Account but for the two first Letters of his Name, with which the jealous Tyrant was told his began who was to succeed him. Hagiochristophorites, Andronicus's chief Minister, went with a sufficient Force to apprehend him, but Isaac defending himself with much Valour slew the Villain with his own Hands, and escaped through the midst of the rest, with his Sword-bloody, into the great Church, where he took Sanctuary. Hither he

The Sicilians Cruelties at Theſſalonica.

he was follow'd not only by his Uncle John Ducas and his Son Isaac, who had been Sureties to the distrustful Tyrant for his good Behaviour, as he had been for theirs, but by Multitudes of People, who flock'd thither out of all Parts of the City, and silently pity'd Isaac, whom they highly esteem'd for his great Birth, without any Thoughts as yet of farther Favours towards him. Some there were, who resorted thither, not so much to behold Isaac, as for their own Security, apprehending the like Usage from the implacable Andronicus; these exclaim'd with great Freedom against the Tyrant, and in artful pathetic Speeches appeal'd to the People, whom they adjured to stay, and protect 'em from the Fury of a Monster, that was become the general Enemy of Mankind.

Isaac Angelus taking Sanctuary is declar'd Emperor.

The Hand of Divine Providence appear'd eminently visible upon this Occasion; for Andronicus happen'd to be absent at that time from the City, and his bloody Ministers were too secure to apprehend any thing from the neglected Mob; who being thus caress'd by the Malecontents, and perceiving no one offer'd any thing in Behalf of the Tyrant, or Dislike of the Tumult, they proceeded from pitying Isaac to curse Andronicus, every Man giving his Tongue a Liberty, which 'till then it durst never have exerted. A great Part of the People continu'd with Isaac all Night, the rest retiring not so much for their Repose, as to prepare their Fellow-Citizens, and create a general Dislike in the Inhabitants to Andronicus.

Early in the Morning Andronicus's Favourites endeavour'd to appease the People, who were so far from listning to them, or Andronicus himself, who arriv'd shortly after, that at a Signal given, as Men inspir'd with one Spirit, they flock'd together into the Temple of St. Sophia; where having revil'd those who appear'd without Weapons in their Hands and declar'd not with them, they broke open all the Prisons, and releas'd the Prisoners; whereof some, who were not of the Dregs of the People, but had been committed by Andronicus for some trivial Offence, or ill-grounded Suspicion, so effectually animated the Multitude against him, that they declar'd him a publick Enemy to the State, and saluted Isaac Emperor.

by

Isaac being thus advanc'd to the Throne by this Isacius
enrag'd promiscuous Assembly, refus'd at first the Angelus.
Crown, which having been worn by Constantine the A. D.
Great, hung for a Monument over the Altar, and was 1184.
now taken down by the Sexton, and presented to Isaac; whose Aversion to it proceeded not from his Want of Ambition, but his Fear of the Dangers that attended it from the Power of Andronicus: Which when his Uncle Ducas observ'd, he desir'd the People,
since his Nephew declin'd it, that they would bestow
it on him; but they in a tumultuary manner reply'd,
they would no more yield Obedience to an Old Bald Pate,
having already suffer'd too much from the hoary Hairs of Andronicus; whereupon Isaac at length suffer'd himself to be Crown'd, after which he was conducted by the Rabble to the Palace.

In the mean time Andronicus, who saw how far the Fury of the Multitude was like to carry 'em, endea-vour'd to appease 'em by an Offer of a Resignation to his Son Manuel; with which when he observ'd 'em to be more enrag'd than before, he divested himself of the Imperial Purple, and escap'd with his Wife Ann to Androni-Meludium, a Royal Palace on the East-side of *Pro-*cus flies,
pontis, resigning all to Isaac, who, by a wonderful Change of Fortune, was advanc'd from the Jaws of Death to the highest of Worldly Honours. Being again saluted Emperor in the Palace, with the repeated Acclamations of the People, he sent out some in whom he had the greatest Confidence to seize on Andronicus, who had embark'd himself on board a Ship with a Design to fly into Tauro Scythia, but was several times forc'd back by foul Weather, the Sea, as it were, abhorring so monstrous a Burden. Being thus repuls'd by the Weather, and pursu'd by Divine Vengeance, he was at length apprehended by those and is ap-who prehended,

who were sent out in quest after him, who clapp'd him in Irons, and presented him to Isaac, as he was busied in composing the Minds of the People, and reforming the disorder'd City. The Indignities he suffer'd from the incens'd Multitude were answerable to the Injuries with which he had provok'd 'em; some of 'em revil'd him and spit in his Face, others pluck'd him by the Nose, and tore off his Beard, whilst the Women, whose Husbands had been either blinded or murder'd by him, were more outrageous in their Resentments. Having his Right Hand cut off, he was committed to Prison, where after he had lain a few Days without either Meat, Drink, or other Comfort, he was set on a scabbed Camel, having one of his Eyes pluck'd out, and with his Face towards the Tail, was led as it were in Triumph through the Forum, his bald Head being all the while bare, and was such a miserable Spectacle as might have drawn Tears from Cruelty it self; but the relentless and incens'd Mob, forgetting the high Character he had lately born, thrust some their Nails into his Head, others threw Filth in his Face, some prick'd him in the Sides with Spits, others cast Stones at him, and all loaded him with their Reproaches and opprobrious Language, no less bitter to him than the rest, all striving among themselves who should do him the greatest Villany. In this shameful Manner they conducted him to the Theatre, and hang'd him up by the Heels, between two Pillars, where they stripp'd him of all his Cloaths, cut off his Privities, and tormented him with Hooks and Harping-Irons for three Days together. All this he supported with an invincible Courage, sometimes crying out, Lord have Mercy upon me; at others, Why do you break a bruised Reed? At length one, more merciful than the rest, thrust his Sword in at his Throat up to the Twist as he hung, and so dispatch'd him. This was the miserable End of this infamous Emperor, after he had tyranniz'd two Years, and done as much Mischief as any and after grievous Torments is murder'd.

of his Predecessors in so short a Space. He was a Prince of a venerable Aspect, well built, and of a youthful Countenance even in his old Age; for having from the Beginning led an active abstemious Life, he had enjoy'd an uninterrupted Series of Health; he never took any Physick 'till after his Advancement to the Throne, and then but once by way of Prevention, and that upon the earnest Sollicitations of his Physicians. He is said once in the Circensian Games to have pointed to the two Pillars between which he was hung, and have told Manuel, that he foresaw a certain Roman Emperor would one Day, after having suffer'd the greatest Indignities, be hung up there by his Rebellious Subjects; to which Manuel reply'd, that the Prophecie, if it was one, did not in the least relate to him, as it too manifestly appear'd afterwards. Had not Andronicus, saith the Greek Annalist, too much abandon'd himself to Ambition and Cruelty, and polluted the Purple with an Effusion of Blood, he might have been esteem'd one of the best of the Comnenian Race; for he was not quite devested of Humanity, but like the Centaure had a Human Countenance, tho' the Parts below were of the Brute. He was Magnificent, and Charitable; he delighted much in publick Buildings, and, had he liv'd longer, would have added much to the Beauty of the City. That which the same Author relates concerning the Image of St. Paul, which is said to have wept before his Death, because he always express'd a profound Respect for the Writings of that Apostle, favours more of the Monkish Bigottry, than the Sincerity of an Historian.

Nicet. p.
227.
His Character.

*Isaaci*us Angelus, being thus advanc'd to the Imperial Throne, at first behav'd himself with much Lenity and Moderation; he recall'd all such as had been banish'd by Andronicus, and restor'd 'em to their Estates, and reliev'd such as were in Want out of the publick Treasury. This gain'd him the Good-will of all his Subjects, who looking on this happy Change, as on a fruitful Spring after the Severities of a tedious Winter,

Winter, flock'd from all Parts to Constantinople, there to behold a second Moses or Zorobabel, and to list themselves in the Service against the Sicilians, who during the Distractions of the late Times had propos'd nothing less than the Subjection of the Imperial City it self, John, Andronicus's eldest Son, was at that time absent in the Provinces, where when the News of the late Revolution was arriv'd, the Soldiers seiz'd on the unfortunate Prince, and pluck'd out his Eyes, of which Cruelty he dy'd shortly after. Manuel, his Brother, was in like manner blinded shortly after, tho' he had been in no manner consenting to his Father's Actions, of which no one was more sensible than the Emperor Isaac himself.

Isaac defeats the Sicilians.

All this while the Sicilians, who had not as yet heard of Andronicus's Fate, rov'd up and down at their Pleasure, destroying all before 'em, when Branas, the Imperial General, fell suddenly upon 'em, and totally overthrew 'em. The Defeat was follow'd by the Surrender of such Cities as had fallen into the Enemy's Hands, and the Destruction of the whole Sicilian Army. Those who had been dispers'd abroad in Garrisons, or sent out upon Parties, fell into the Hands of the Country People, who cut 'em all off. Their Fleet, consisting of two hundred Sail, met with no better Fortune, but in their Return home were either destroy'd by a Tempest, or so weaken'd by Sickness, that they fell into the Emperor's Hands, whose Cruelty to his Prisoners very much sully'd the Honour of the Victory, which he had obtain'd both by Sea and Land; for he suffer'd some thousands to perish in Prison for want of Food; and when the King of Sicily upbraided him for his Want of Humanity, he contemn'd the Message, and severely check'd those who had the Tenderness to relieve 'em, tho' with no other Sustenance than with Bread and Water. This Behaviour was more suitable to Isaac's Temper than his former Moderation and Lenity, as it afterwards appear'd, when his bloody

Seve-

Severities made him compar'd to Andronicus himself.

Having put an End to the Sicilian War, and bought a shameful Peace of the Turks, who had taken several Places of great Consequence from the Empire in the lesser Asia, and, being now a Widower, he thought of marrying again, and made choice of a Foreigner, the Daughter of Bela King of Hungary, who was not yet full ten Years of Age. The Nuptials were celebrated by the parsimonious Emperor, who was willing to spare his own Purse, at the Expence of the Provincial Cities, which very much disoblig'd the Inhabitants, and forc'd those of Mount Hæmus into a Rebellion, and consequently drew a great Charge upon the State.

All this while Isaac Comnenus tyranniz'd in Cyprus, nor was he to be reduc'd either by large Promises of mighty Rewards made to him by the Emperor, nor the Terror of the Forces he saw Isaac arming against him, but exercis'd the most barbarous Cruelties over the Inhabitants. The Emperor mann'd out a Fleet consisting of seventy Sail, and chose John Contostephanus and Alexius Comnenus for his Admirals; the first of which being old and infirm, and the other who was the Emperor's near Kinsman, having lost his Eyes by Andronicus's Order, tho' otherwise a Man of Courage, and of an Age fit for Action, they who wish'd well to the State entertain'd melancholy Apprehensions of their Success. The Fleet setting Sail was first horribly shaken by a Tempest, and at length, through the Indiscretion of the Commanders, lost entirely to the Enemy; for Margarites, a notorious Pirate, watching his Opportunity when all the Forces were order'd ashore to fight the Enemy, who seem'd ready to give 'em Battel, seiz'd the Ships thus weaken'd and disarm'd, whilst the Tyrant fell on the Soldiers that were landed, from whom all Possibility of a Retreat was cut off, and obtain'd an easie Conquest over 'em.

His Forces
defeated by the Cypri-
ots.

This Misfortune encourag'd others who were not well affected to the Empire to declare themselves against

The Mysian War.

gainst it, especially the Mysians, who having been oppress'd by the Emperor's unjust Exactions, flew out into an open Rebellion; and when they had receiv'd a small Defeat from the Imperialists, they drew the Scythians into the Quarrel, and having rais'd a formidable Army consisting of both Nations, they renew'd their Hostilities, and exceedingly harrafs'd the Borders of the Empire. Isaac, who was himself naturally sloathful and unactive, sent out John his Uncle against 'em; and John behav'd himself with so much Prudence and Conduct, that had he not been recall'd by the unworthy Emperor, who was grown jealous of those that were more deserving than himself, he had in all probability made an End of the War. John was succeeded by another John, surnam'd Cautacuzenus, who having marry'd the Emperor's Sister, had been declar'd Cæsar. He was a Man of great Courage and Resolution, but rash and inconsiderate, and by his ill Conduct gave the Enemy frequent Advantages over him; whereupon he was recall'd, and Branas Alexius appointed to succeed him. Branas was one of the greatest Captains of his Age, but Proud and Ambitious; he had serv'd as General before in the Sicilian War, but at his Return aspir'd at the Imperial Dignity, for which notwithstanding he was pardon'd upon his Submission, and was now again declar'd General against the Mysians. His Success in this War reviv'd in him his former Pretensions: For having obtain'd some Advantages over the Enemy, he return'd on a sudden with his most intimate Friends and nearest Relations to Adrianople, the Place of his Nativity, where he was declar'd Emperor, and march'd instantly towards the Imperial City, presuming upon the Negligence and Weakness of the sluggish Emperor, and the Valour and Experience of the Latins, who had espous'd his Interest. Being advanc'd with his Army near the City, he attempted several Ways to get it into his Hands, but found it as difficult to get an Entrance into it, as 'twas for the Empe-

Branas usurps.

Emperor to drive him from before it. The Besieg'd sally'd out frequently upon their Enemies, who always drove 'em back not without a considerable Loss on their side; so that the Usurper finding it impossible to obtain his Ends by Force, thought it advisable to try what he could oblige 'em to by Famine, for all the neighbouring Provinces, both on the Asiatick and European Side, having declar'd for him, he was able to cut off all Supplies of Provisions.

In the mean time the Emperor had Recourse to nothing but his Devotions, 'till he was rous'd by Conrade, the Marquis of Montferrat, who having been a Pensioner to Manuel, the late Emperor, and done him signal Services in Italy, was now in great Esteem at Constantinople. This Man awaken'd the Emperor out of his Religious Lethargy, and summon'd him to the Discharge of his Imperial Function. He collected all his Forces into one Body, march'd out at the Head of 'em, and presented Branas with Battel. The Dispute lasted on both Sides with a great Obstinacy for a considerable time, till in the end the Emperor's Forces prevail'd, and Branas and most of his Accomplices were either slain or taken Prisoners. The Use the Emperor made of this Victory show'd him unworthy of it, for he suffer'd his Soldiers to plunder and destroy the Possessions of all such as had revolted to the Usurper, so that all the Buildings in the Suburbs, and upon the Propontis, were in a Moment devoured by the Flames; and there was no Villany which the licentious Soldiers did not commit upon that Occasion with the greatest Impunity.

This Insurrection being so happily quell'd, the Emperor look'd with a jealous Eye upon the mighty Preparations which the renown'd Frederick Barbarossa, Emperor of Germany, was making in the West, design'd by him for the Holy-Land, but suspected by the unworthy Prince as directed chiefly against him. Saladin, the Turkish Sultan, who had great Reason to be terrify'd at the Storm which so apparently threaten'd him, had so artfully prepar'd Isaac, by the Surrender of some Fugitive Traitors, and a Promise of restoring Palestine to him, upon Condition that he would obstruct the Passage of the Western Christians, that he equall'd most of his Predecessors in his Perfidiousness towards 'em. Tho' he had promis'd to grant Frederick free Passage through his Territories, and to afford him all manner of Refreshments and Accommodations for his Army, yet he no sooner heard of his Arrival upon the Borders, but he sent his Cousin Manuel, the Great Master of his Horse, at the Head of a powerful Army to dispute the Passes with the Germans, and to intercept their Provisions; having some time before thrown the Bishop of Munster, the Earl of Nassau, and Count Walram, Frederick's Ambassadors, into Prison, without any Regard had to the Law of Nations, and the high Dignity of their Master. The German Van-guard, provok'd at Isaac's Perfidiousness, easily forc'd their Way through those who were sent to oppose 'em, and passing the Mountains which lead into Thrace, the whole Army fell into that Country, where they were suffer'd to live at Discretion, and to seize on the Grain, which they found in great Abundance of all Kinds in the Fields, before the Greeks had time to remove it into the fortify'd Towns, according to the Orders they had receiv'd from the Emperor.

Isaac's Behaviour to the German Emperor.

Tho' the Germans were by this time got into the Heart of Thrace, and the Greeks had neither Power nor Courage sufficient to restrain 'em, yet did Isaac with an insupportable Vanity send to Frederick, to whom he deny'd the Title of Emperor, giving him to understand that he knew of but one Emperor, which was himself, and that if he would in that Quality acknowledge him as his Lord and Master, and give him so many Hostages as he demanded for his Security, that he would attempt nothing contrary

trary to his Service or Interest, but give him a Moiety of whatever he should obtain by Conquest from the Saracens, then, and upon no other Terms, he was resolv'd to allow him the Liberty of Passage which he desir'd.

Whether this was really what Isaac had in so insolent a manner demanded, or the Ambassadors had unadvisedly exceeded their Commission, as Nice-Nicer. p. 257. our Historian assures us they did, Frederick thought fit to conceal his Resentment 'till he had obtain'd the Release of his Ambassadors, and answer'd with a disdainful Smile, that he trusted too much in the Merits of his Cause, and the Courage of those brave Men who attended him, to comply with such dishonourable Conditions; that however, when Isaac had restor'd him his Ambassadors, whom with so much Inhumanity, and scandal to the Christian Religion, he held in Chains, he should then think himself oblig'd to make him such Acknowledgments, as consisted with the Honour of God, and of the Empire. After which he advanc'd, without waiting for an Answer, and seizing upon all the Places in his Passage without any Resistance, he encamp'd on the twenty fifth of August within View of Philippopolis, which was shortly after quitted by the Inhabitants, who left their Habitations, with a prodigious plenty of Provisions to Frederick's Soldiers.

This Advantage of the Germans highly incens'd Isaac against Manuel, his General, whom he accus'd of Cowardice, and sent him express Orders to fight with the Enemy; accordingly he advanc'd within six Miles of Philippopolis, but was so little acquainted with warlike Affairs, that a Party of Germans being abroad to scour the Country, and discover the Posture of the Enemy, presum'd to assault his whole Army, and did it with so much Courage and Success, that the degenerate Greeks turn'd their Backs, and left a handful of Germans Masters of the Field; who after this found none who had Resolution enough to oppose pose 'em, but seiz'd on Nicopolis, Adrianople, and all the Cities between the Agean and Euxine Sea, and enlarg'd their Conquests on both Sides to the very Gates of Constantinople.

Isaac being by this time sufficiently punish'd for his Perfidy, which had brought him to the last Extremities, set Frederick's Ambassadors at Liberty, and in a suppliant manner su'd for a Peace, offering to supply him with whatever Ships were necessary to transport him into Asia; desiring at the same time that his Passage might be as quick as possible, and that he might have Hostages deliver'd him for his Security. But Frederick who thought it became him to chastise the Pride of this feeble but presumptuous Prince, let him know that he look'd on himself to be the Rightful Emperor of the Romans, and as such answer'd the Ambassadors, that it was the Right of the Conquerors to prescribe Laws to the Vanquish'd, and that it belong'd to him, who had conquer'd Thrace, to dispose of it at his Pleasure; that therefore he was resolv'd to winter there with his whole Army, since he by his Perfidiousness had retarded his Voyage 'till it was too late in the Year now to attempt it. He order'd him at his Peril to provide him with a sufficient Number of Ships against Easter, and since he had no reason to repose any Confidence in his Promises, he commanded him to send him four and twenty of the principal Officers and Lords of his Court, and eight hundred Persons of inferior Quality, as Hostages for his good Behaviour; which when he had done, he was ready to give him the Assurance of his Oath, that he had no Designs upon his Empire, as he had persuaded himself vainly to imagine, thereby to gain a tolerable Pretence for his perfidious Dealings, and the Violation of his Faith.

Isaac is forced to submit to the Germans.

Isaac, who had before born it with so high a Hand, sufficiently discover'd the Meanness of his Soul in this Conjunction; for he with great readiness accepted of these Dishonourable Conditions, and without Delay sent sent the Ratification, with the Hostages, and great Presents to the Emperor; who winter'd at Adrianople, 'till the Spring approach'd, and then he remov'd to Callipolis, in Order to pass the Hellespont, and upon his Arrival found a greater Number of Ships than he had been promis'd by Isaac, who was glad at any Expence to remove those dangerous, troublesome, and expensive Guests.

Isaac, being thus deliver'd from the Germans, busied himself in the Settlement of his Family; his eldest Daughter was made a Nun, and his youngest marry'd to Tancred, the King of Sicily's Son, and his Son Alexius (of whom we shall have Occasion to say more hereafter) was design'd for his Successor, tho' he still promis'd himself a Reign of thirty two Years, notwithstanding that he was hourly alarm'd by daily Conspiracies, and frequent Usurpations.

Among the many Pretenders that claim'd a Right to the Imperial Crown, none prov'd at first more dangerous than one, who pretending himself to be Alexius, the Son of Manuel, depos'd by Andronicus, but not murder'd, as it was falsely reported, plaid his Part with so much Address in the Sultan of Iconium's Court, that, by Leave from the Sultan, he in a short time rais'd an Army consisting of eight thousand Men accusom'd to Depredations, with which he seiz'd most of the Cities seated on the Meander. The Disaffection of the People in general to Isaac made this Usurpation more dangerous, for tho' there were very few but mistrusted what the Impostor had so confidently affirm'd, yet all wishing it had been so, they all seem'd to believe it. By this means he gain'd Ground daily, and having defeated several of the Emperors General's, he was thought so considerable at length, that no less a Man than the Emperor's own Brother Alexius was judg'd the most fit to oppose him; and Alexius, tho' a Man forward and courageous, durst not venture a Battel with him, but thought he should do a considerable piece of Service

Frequent Usurpations.

vice if he could preserve those Towns firm in their Obedience, who had not yet revolted to him. Thus, in all probability, the War might have been prolong'd, to the apparent hazard of the Emperor's Dignity, and weakning of the Empire, had not God thought fit to remove the Usurper by the Hands of a Priest, who cut off his Head as he lay fast asleep, after he had taken a larger Draught of Wine than usual.

The Fate of this Usurper did not deter others from the like Attempts; the Contempt they had entertain'd of the present Emperor made 'em bold and aspiring, and tho' none of 'em obtain'd the Crown they aim'd at, they made it sit uneasie on his Head that wore it. At the same time the Scythians, encourag'd by these Domestick Commotions, renew'd their Incursions, and harass'd the Borders of the Empire. Against these Isaac thought fit to undertake an Expedition in Person, but prepar'd to return before he had effected any thing considerable, and lost the greatest part of his Army in his Retreat, he himself escaping with much Difficulty. This Disaster encourag'd the Barbarians, so that they ranack'd the Roman Towns at their Pleasure, destroying the Inhabitants, or leading 'em into Captivity.

The Scythians prevail against the Emperor.

Isaac neglects the Affairs of State.

In the mean time Isaac abandon'd all the Care and Trouble of the Empire, first to an old doting Eunuch, call'd Theodorus Castamonita; and after that to some young fantastical Boy, scarcely pass'd the Discipline of a School, who notwithstanding govern'd both the Emperor and Empire at Pleasure, whilst Isaac delighted in nothing but the luxurious Enjoyment of his Riches, expensive Buildings, and ridiculous Amusements; for the Support of which he had Recourse to all manner of exorbitant exactions, and abstain'd not from Sacrilege it self: Till he was once more rouz'd by the prevailing Arms of the Scythians, who in a late Engagement near Adrianople, had defeated both Alexius Guido, General of the Eastern, and Batatzes Basilus, Commander of the Western Forces, the first of which

which with great Difficulty escap'd, and the other, having lost all his Men, was kill'd upon the Spot. For this Reason Isaac order'd new Levies to be made, and having hir'd considerable Forces from abroad, march'd at the Head of his Army against the Barbarians, resolving never to return 'till he had severely chastis'd 'em for these Indignities offer'd the Empire; which however was not so much in Danger from the open Attempts of Foreign declar'd Enemies, as he was expos'd to the secret Machinations of Domestick Traitors.

Alexius Angelus, the Emperor's Brother, had in a particular manner been carefs'd and indulg'd by him from the time of his Advancement; and tho' he had receiv'd frequent Intimations, especially towards the latter end of his Reign, of Alexius his treacherous Designs, and the Danger he was to apprehend from him, yet he severely reprov'd his friendly Admonishers, as Men desirous to create Dissentions in his Family, and sow Divisions in the State, and at the same time repos'd a greater Confidence in Alexius than ever; so fatally blind are those Men to their own Safety, whom God in his infinite Wisdom has determin'd to destroy.

Being arriv'd at Cypsella, a Town near the Frontiers, he there halted, till the rest of his Army could join him. He was now grown into a general Dislike of the Nobility, some justly abominating him for his many Cruelties, others for his Negligence in the publick Administration, and not a few uniting in a Conspiracy against him from the desire of a Change, and a Prospect of the Advantages they promis'd themselves from it; so that Alexius found enow among 'em ready to espouse his Interest, and combine against Isaac. Having concerted all things in such a manner as they judg'd safe and convenient, the Conspirators propos'd to put their Design in execution at this Place. One Day when the Emperor invited his Brother out a Hunting, Alexius pretended an Indisposition, and desir'd to be 1194.

A. D.

and is deposed by his Brother
Alexius
Angelus.

be excus'd, and the unhappy Isaac, who mistrusted nothing of what follow'd, prepar'd for the Chace without him; where whilst he was diverting himself, the Conspirators, many of whom were nearly ally'd to the Emperor, forc'd Alexius, as it had been agreed among 'em before, to the Imperial Pavillion, and with reiterated Acclamations declar'd him Emperor; in which they were follow'd by the whole Army, and even by Isaac's own Servants and chief Favourites, who join'd with the Croud, wishing Alexius a long and auspicious Reign. Isaac at the first Alarm turn'd his Horse, and thought by his Presence to divert that Storm, which having been so long gathering, stood now ready to destroy him; which when he too late observ'd, he committed himself to the Divine Protection, and fled with great Precipitation to Macra, where he was overtaken by those his Brother had employ'd to apprehend him; who by vertue of the same Order pluck'd out his Eyes, and threw him into Prison, where he liv'd as it were out of the World, condemn'd to perpetual Darknes by an inhuman ungrateful Brother, whom in his Prosperity he had redeem'd for a great Sum of Money from the Turks, for which he was thus unworthily rewarded in the tenth Year of his Reign, and fortieth of his Age, An. Dom. 1194.

Isaac's
Character.

If we consider rightly the Character of Isaac Angelus, the late Emperor, we shall have no great Reason to wonder at the ready Concurrence of the Army, the Senate, and Clergy, in his Destruction. He was a Man who had little either of Courage or generous Resolution, the want of which was abundantly supply'd with Vanity and Presumption, which made those Vices more expos'd, by which Princes render themselves hated, and become despicable to their Subjects; for he was sottish even to downright Folly, inconstant, cowardly, effeminate, voluptuous, foolishly prodigal, and most infamously covetous, making no Difficulty to take any thing that pleas'd his Fancy, robbing even Churches of their Jewels, Plate and Consecrated secrated Vessels, which he us'd without any scruple at his publick Entertainments. He had no Sense of Honour, nor regard to his Word, any further than consist-ed with his own Humour or Interest. This made him unhappy in his Government, and unpity'd in his Fall, which introduc'd such a Revolution as Constantinople had not known before, and which was shortly after follow'd by the Dissolution of the Empire.

Alexius being thus with the general Consent of the People acknowledg'd Emperor, sent to acquaint his Wife and Relations, whom he had left behind in the City, with his Advancement: At the same time he endeavour'd to reward those who had appear'd most forward in his Promotion, and by several popular Acts labour'd to confirm the People in their Obedience to that Government, to which they had so voluntarily submitted. His publick Reception into the City was attended with many Omens, which seem'd to declare the Divine Displeasure, and to denounce the Calamities which afterwards beset the Empire. As he was going to mount an Arabian Horse, which be-long'd formerly to his Brother, and was now adorn'd with the Imperial Trappings, as the Solemnity requir'd, the Beast disdaining the Burden rear'd himself on his hind Feet, and gave the astonish'd Beholders evident Signs of his Indignation. When the Assistants had with much Address mollify'd him, and the new Emperor was mounted, the angry Steed grew more enrag'd than before, as if he had been ignorantly betray'd into that Compliance, and would never be pacify'd 'till he had thrown the unworthy Rider upon the Ground. This, and other Accidents, gave some of the most Curious an Occasion of reflecting upon the late Transactions, and presented 'em with a melancholy Prospect of what was to come.
Nicet. p.
294.

Notwithstanding this the unworthy Emperor polluted the Throne with the same Vices, for which he pretended to have remov'd his Brother. Instead of chastizing the Mysians, who continu'd their Depredations,

Alexius is as bad as his Brother.

tions, or arming against the Turks, who since the Death of the Emperor Manuel had taken several strong Towns in the lesser Asia, and great part of Phrygia from the Empire, he abandon'd himself to Riot and Luxury, and the Gratification of his sensual Appetites, squandering away with both Hands his Predecessors Treasure, never considering how much he should want it hereafter, and how difficult, if not impossible, it would be to recover it. And as if one Tyrant was not sufficient to afflict a dejected State, he was marry'd to another who equal'd him in all his Extravagances, and in many exceeded him: Her Name was Euphrosyne, a Woman of a valuable Tongue and ready Mind, but withal ambitious, immodest, and prodigally Luxurious, who imitating her Husband in all his Arbitrary Proceedings, acted with an uncontroll'd Authority, and presum'd sometimes to contradict and rescind what the Emperor himself had ordain'd.

These dissolute Proceedings in the Court gave Encouragement to several Impostors, with which those Times were pregnant, who being countenanc'd and supported secretly by the Turks, brought great Calamities upon the Empire; at the same time that the restless implacable Mysians continu'd their Hostilities, and destroy'd whole Legions at once, growing arrogant from their frequent Advantages, and entertaining a thorough Contempt of the Roman Emperor: Notwithstanding which he had once an Opportunity offer'd him of reducing the whole Country, whilst the Mysians were at Variance among themselves, which he either totally neglected, or manag'd with so much Indiscretion, as gave the World reason to think he had no Sense of the Trust repos'd in him, but that he govern'd for his own sake, and not for the Safety and Honour of the Empire, whose Fate was unavoidable, and its Destruction nigh at hand.

His Aversion to publick Affairs
fatal to the Empire.

This proceeded in a great Measure from the Aversion Alexius had to publick Affairs, and the great Confidence he put in his Favourites, who govern'd all

with

with a mercenary Hand, and made the highest Employments of the Empire venal; so little regarding the Birth or Abilities of those they prefer'd, that even Syrians and Scythians enjoy'd Posts of the greatest Honour and Profit: So that the Barbarians prevail'd on every side, the Emperor being unable to resist 'em when assaulted, or manage those Divisions which often happen'd between 'em to his Advantage.

Thus for seven Years together did the State suffer under this unhappy Prince's Administration, 'till the Divine Vengeance at length overtook him, and stripp'd him of those Honours he had so long usurp'd, and of which he was so highly undeserving. Tho' at first he had us'd his Brother Isaac with the greatest Barbarity, and having pluck'd out his Eyes caus'd him to be lock'd up in Irons with his young Son Alexius, a Prince of about twelve Years of Age; yet by degrees growing fatally secure, he began to pity those he had stripp'd of the Imperial Ornaments, and suffering his Brother to live in an handsome Palace without the City, he receiv'd the young Alexius into the Court, where he attended upon his Person, and shar'd with him in all his Diversions.

A. D.
1202.

However the two injur'd Princes either thought themselves too highly affronted ever to forgive the Offender, or perceiving how odious the Usurper render'd himself every Day to the People, and into what Calamities he plung'd the State, began to reflect on the Dignity they had lost, and to consider how they might recover their former Honours. Isaac, having the Liberty to admit all such as came to visit him, treated so secretly with the Latins, that by their means he found a way of corresponding with his Daughter Irene, at that time the Wife of Philip the German Emperor, who promis'd to dispose the Spirit of her Husband, to undertake the Protection of the two unfortunate Princes. Whilst this was in Agitation, the young Alexius, who was at Liberty

berty to go where he pleas'd, withdrew secretly, and got aboard a Ship belonging to a Merchant of Pisa, who undertook to carry him off. The thing was manag'd with so much Cunning, that when the Guards the Tyrant upon the News of his Escape had sent to search all the Vessels, came on Board the Pi-
san, riding then on the Mouth of the Hellespont ready to sail, and search'd her with more Exactness than all the rest, the Prince disguis'd like an Italian Sailor boldly receiv'd 'em upon the Deck, and undertook himself to be their Conductor, leading 'em into the most secret Places of the Ship, and thus by not being hid escap'd the Danger of being found; so that the Ship being thereupon discharg'd, the Prince landed safe in Sicily; where having for some time conferr'd with his Sister, he proceeded from thence to Rome, to solicit the Assistance of Pope Innocent;
 and from thence he pass'd with his Retinue by Land into Germany. Philip, who had an entire Affection for Irene the Empress, Alexius his Sister, was sensibly touch'd with the Misfortunes of his Family, but being at that time oblig'd to dispute the Empire with Otho
 his Competitor, he had too great Affairs upon his Hands already to attempt the Restitution of the Prince himself, and therefore advis'd him to engage the French and Venetians to assist him, who had then a great Army on foot in Dalmatia for the Conquest of the Holy-Land, and to whom it behov'd him to make such advantageous Offers, as would encourage 'em to comply both out of Interest, Honour, and the publick Good of Christendom. To this the Prince readily consented, and agreed to such Terms, upon Condition they would restore him, as had he then rightly consider'd he would have found difficult, if not impossible to perform. Having in this manner concerted his Matters with Philip, he apply'd himself to the Princes by his Ambassadors, who had Orders to omit nothing that might oblige the Republick and the French to conclude the Treaty: Being admitted

Alexius,
the Son of Isaac en- gages the Latins to restore him.

to Audience, they told 'em, They were not come to retard their glorious Enterprize for the Conquest of the Holy-Land, but to present 'em with a Way safe, easie, and absolutely necessary for the Accomplishment of it. That whereas they at first design'd to carry their Arms into Egypt, and by that Way to enter into Palestine, they requested they would rather employ those Arms in the Recovery of Constantinople to the lawful Heir, by which Means they would render themselves Masters of it; the Omission of which had heretofore caus'd the Loss of two such flourishing Armies, as might otherwise have easily triumph'd over all the East, that great City being the very Key of Europe and Asia. They represented to 'em, the little Trust was to be repos'd in the Usurper, who had barbarously affronted both the Emperor and the King of France; they assur'd 'em of his Cowardice and Inactivity, and how readily his Subjects would renounce their Allegiance to him, when once they beheld the young Prince, whom they ador'd, at the Head of so flourishing an Army. They concluded by engaging for the Prince, that as soon as they had establish'd him upon the Imperial Throne of Constantinople, he should pay 'em two hundred thousand Marks in Silver towards the Expences of the War, maintain ten thousand Men a whole Year at his own Charges to assist 'em in the Conquest of Eygpt, and to pay, during his Life, five hundred Knights well arm'd for the Preservation of the Conquests which they should make in the Holy-Land.

After some Disputes among the Princes, which were manag'd a while with great Heat, the Major Part inclin'd to these Propositions, being principally induc'd to it by Henry Dandolo, Doge of Venice, who being now above fourscore Years old, tho' neither decrepid in Body nor decay'd in Mind, his great Age render'd him still more August and Venerable. He was a great Captain, valiant Soldier, and able Politician, which, besides his great Thirst of Glory, which he retain'd even in those Years, made him more sensible of the Advantages that would arise to the Crusade from the Agreement propos'd by Alexius his Ambassadors. Be-

Henry Dandolo, Doge of Venice.

sides

sides this, he had for a long time cherish'd an invincible Hatred to the Constantinopolitan Emperors, for when about fifty Years before he was employ'd by the Republick as their Ambassador at Constantinople, where he generously sustain'd his Character, and boldly maintain'd the Interest of his Country, the perfidious Emperor Manuel, not accustom'd to such an honest Freedom, caus'd a red hot Plate of Iron to be held before his Eyes, with which his Sight was not wholly lost, tho' it mightily impair'd it; the Sense of which barbarous Outrage, and Violation of the Law of Nations, liv'd in his Memory 'till his dying Day.

The Articles of the Treaty being ratify'd by mutual Oaths on each side, Part of the Army embark'd and set Sail for Corfu, where the whole Navy was appointed to rendezvous, whilst the Doge and the Marquis of Montferrat, who had been chosen Head of the Crusade, and had the Honour to be ally'd to the young Alexius, staid behind in Expectation of that Prince's Arrival, who came in a few Days after very magnificently attended. The Marquis and Dandolo having done him all the Honours imaginable, and protested they would sacrifice all for his Service, the Fleet weigh'd Anchor, and for a happy Beginning of the War, as they came before Dyrrachium, the Inhabitants being inform'd that the young Prince was on board that Fleet, they presented him with the Keys of the Place, and swore an inviolably Fidelity to him. Encourag'd by this happy Prefage, they continu'd their Course a few Days after, and join'd the other Part of the Army, which was already landed upon the Island of Corfu, where they were supply'd with all manner of Necessaries for their Refreshment, and the young Alexius, at his Arrival, was met by the rest of the Princes, and conducted in a triumphant Manner to the Camp.

Here they continu'd 'till Whitson-Eve, to allay some Disputes that had prevail'd in the Army; after which they

they embark'd, and having coasted all Morea and Achaia, the Fleet came to an Anchor in the Negropont; the next Place they anchor'd at was St. Stephen's Port upon the Bank of the Propontis, from whence the Wind and Current carry'd 'em Eastward along by the Coasts of the City, whose Walls were crouded with the Emperor's Soldiers, and who from thence beheld one of the fairest and yet most terrible Sights in the World, three hundred Vessels in Order of Battel, with their Standards flying upon their Poops, their Ensigns display'd, and their Flags and Pendants wantoning in the Wind; in which Condition that gallant formidable Navy, bearing with full Sails before the Wind, was carry'd to the Port of Chalcedon, opposite to Constantinople, where the Army made an immediate Descent, and march'd by Land in Order of Battel along the Bosphorus, whilst the Fleet was conducted to Scrutari or Chrysopolis, opposite likewise to the Imperial City.

*The Latins Fleet before
Constantinople.*

In the mean time Alexius, the Roman Emperor, as the Greek Writers still term'd their Princes, tho' he had receiv'd timely Intimation of the great Preparations the Latins were forming against him, and that they had undertaken to settle the young Alexius in the Throne, had taken no Care for his own Defence and that of the State, but drowning himself in his sensual Pleasures, would sometimes, in the Jollity of his Entertainments and Heat of Wine, tell his debauch'd Companions, that a Party of his Guards should go and bring that Handful of Madmen bound fast in Irons, who being weary of their Lives were come so far to receive the Honour of dying by his Commands. Nor did he recover out of this profound Stupidity, 'till he understood that the Confederate Army, after the Reduction of Dyrrachium, had assur'd themselves of Corfu, and then indeed he was persuaded to give necessary Orders for the Defence of Constantinople, summoning all the Soldiers that were quarter'd in the adjacent Parts to march thither. He was able to man out no more than twenty Gallies to guard the Chain, which was drawn from a Tower near Galata, and being fasten'd to the Acropolis lock'd up the Entrance into the Haven; the Arsenal having been so impoverish'd by Michael Stryphnus his Admiral, who had marry'd his Wife's Sister, and had sold the Sails, Cordage, and Anchors, and exchange'd even the Bolts and Iron, Nails of his Navy for Gold.

*Alexius
his senseless
Security.*

After he had in this manner provided for the Defence of Constantinople, he drew out his Army, and encamp'd upon the Banks of the Bosphorus opposite to the Confederates, whose Numbers were far inferior to his, who notwithstanding pass'd over the Bosphorus shortly after in admirable Order, and landed in sight of that great Army, who at first pretended to oppose 'em with their Arrows and Cross-bows; but when they saw the French, without waiting 'till their Horses were landed, march directly towards 'em with their Swords in their Hands, they fled so swift away, that nothing but their own Fears was able to overtake 'em.

A. D.
1203.
Constantinople
Besieg'd.

The French, being thus happily landed, lodg'd that Night in the Jews Quarter upon the Bosphorus, and the next Day assaulted the Castle of Galata, which they took after a great Slaughter, at the same time that the Venetians, being favour'd by an Easterly Wind, which bore their Ships up to the Chain, cut it in two with prodigious Scissors of Steel, which were open'd and shut with an Engine, by which means the whole Fleet enter'd the Port, and all the Greek Vessels were either taken, disabled, or sunk. After this they prepar'd to attack the Town in two Places, one by Sea, on the Port-side, which the Venetians undertook, and the other by Land, which was committed to the French. Having batter'd the Walls for ten Days together, they at length resolv'd to give a general Assault both by Sea and Land, which they did on the seventeenth of July by Break of Day, at which time the whole Army fell on with all the Courage

Courage and Resolution imaginable. The Greeks, being assisted both by their Number, and the Advantage of the Place, defended themselves at first with great Success, 'till Dandolo did an Action which has eterniz'd his Memory to all Posterity, and left him the Reputation of having been one of the greatest Men in the World: For aged as he was, transported with a valiant Impatience, he posted himself on the forepart of the Admiral Gally with his Sword drawn, and the great Standard of St. Mark before him, commanding his Men upon peril of their Lives, to use their utmost Skill and Force to get ashore. This Command, enforc'd with so terrible a Menace, was follow'd with such a quick Obedience, that the Gally was in an Instant brought to the Shore, and the Doge advanc'd with the Standard to the Walls; by which Example of Heroick Courage he drew all from on board the Fleet after him; for they who were in the other Gallies, fearing they should fall under the Infamy of having abandon'd their General in so noble a Danger, row'd with their utmost Force, and gain'd the Shore almost at the same time together, and ran like enrag'd Lions after their Leader to the Assault. The French were astonish'd when they beheld on a sudden the great Standard of St. Mark placed upon one of the Towers, which redoubled their Courage, and animated 'em with fresh Vigour, 'till such time as a terrible Cloud of Dust, which advanc'd towards 'em, the sound of Trumpets, the neighing of Horses, and the noise of an infinite Number of People, oblig'd them to quit the Assault, and put themselves in a Posture of Defence.

Dandolo's Bravery.

For Alexius the Emperor, being compell'd by the loud Cries and Murmurs of his People and Soldiers, who openly reproach'd him with his Cowardice, and fearing lest in the heat of their Resentments they should fall upon him and pull him to pieces, had at last sally'd out of the City, with an intent to charge

Alexius sallying out is repuls'd.

the Army in the Rear, if they continu'd the Assault, or give 'em Battel in the open Field if they had the Courage to accept of it; not doubting but he should be able to surround 'em and cut 'em in pieces, having above sixty Battalions of fresh Men supported by all his Cavalry, to no more than six of theirs, already weary'd with a desperate Assault. As the Princes were drawing up their Troops in the most commodious manner to receive him, they receiv'd with an incredible Joy a Reinforcement, which the generous Dandolo brought to their Assistance. Dandolo had by this time master'd twenty five Towers, part of a hundred built on the Side of the Haven, and hearing now that the Emperor had made a Sally, he caus'd himself to be conducted immediately to the Camp, with all the Forces he could rally, to sustain the Shock of the Enemy, who having promis'd themselves that they should be able to oppress the Confederates with Multitude, when they found now they would not be drawn from their Intrenchments, but expected 'em there with a resolute Courage, they quickly retir'd into the Town, never daring once to turn Head against that Handful of Men, who had the Confidence to follow 'em for some time in good Order, discharging continually upon their Rear in the open Field, where they might have given 'em Battel.

This shameful Retreat was not occasion'd more by the Cowardice than the Jealousie of the unworthy Alexius, who would not suffer his Son-in-Law Theodorus Lascaris to make one in the Sally; for had he commanded, being both a Soldier and Captain, the most valiant of his Nation, he would have made better use of that infinite Number of Hands, which remain'd wholly unprofitable that Day, by reason their Commander had neither Courage nor Skill enough to manage 'em to the best Advantage.

Alexius, being thus shamefully retir'd into the City, pretended the better to shelter himself from the Reproaches proaches of the People, that he had deferr'd the Combat, by reason it was late, and that the next Morning he was resolv'd to attack the Enemies in their Camp, if they had the Courage to expect him; but being pursu'd and terrify'd by his own Conscience, instead of preparing for the Encounter, he secretly embark'd himself with a few of his Domesticks, all the Gold, Silver, and the Imperial Ornaments, and fled to Zagora, anciently call'd Debeltus, a City of Thrace, and flies, standing at the Foot of Mount Hæmus, where, by reason of his Guilt, his Cowardice, and the Contempt into which he was fallen, having Cause to fear some great Revolution in his Fortune he had beforehand assur'd himself of a Retreat.

The People had no sooner discover'd the Flight of the Usurper, but detesting his infamous Cowardice, and fearing lest the Latins should in so favourable a Conjecture assault the City a second time, and take it by Force, ran to the Prison, where the Tyrant, after the young Alexius his escape, had caus'd Isaac to be detain'd, and knock'd off the Manacles of the poor Prince, who had been so barbarously treated by his own Brother, and having placed him on the Imperial Throne, from which about eight Years before, he had been so violently driven, they sent Deputies to the Princes, to give them an Account of the Flight of the Usurper, and the Re-establishment of the Emperor Isaac, and to invite the young Prince to share the Empire with his Father. The Princes were agreeably surpriz'd at so unexpected a Revolution, but being grown from long Experience distrustful of the Greeks, they the next Morning, at the Head of their Army, which they had drawn up in Battalia, acquainted the young Alexius, that they expected an Assurance of the Performance of the Treaty, and to have it ratify'd by the Emperor his Father; whereupon two Lords of France, and two Venetian Noblemen were dispatch'd to that Prince, who receiv'd 'em with all manner of Honour and Magni-

Isaac is restor'd with his Son Alexius,

who is Crown'd in Constantinople.

Magnificence, and tho' he found the Articles very hard, yet over-joy'd at his Re-establishment, and fearful of losing his Empire a second time, should he by a Refusal provoke his Deliverers, he instantly ratify'd 'em, and oblig'd himself with solemn Oaths to an inviolable Performance : After which the young Prince was conducted by the Confederate Lords in great Triumph to Constantinople, where he was associated with his Father in the Empire, and Crown'd the first of August, with all Magnificence and Solemnity, A. D. 1203.

Among other things that Alexius had oblig'd himself to perform, he promis'd to renounce the Schism of his Ancestors, and subject the Greek Church to the See of Rome ; wherefore, that he might satisfy the Princes in so important an Article, he writ a handsom Letter to Pope Innocent, whom he acknowledg'd to be Christ's Vicar upon Earth, and Supream Head of the Universal Church ; promising to render him and his Successors that filial Obedience which was their Due, and to imploy all his Power to re-unite the Greek Church to the Head. These Letters and Promises cost him nothing, but he found it more difficult to answer the other Parts of his Engagement, to pay the Money he had promis'd, and furnish the Troops he had oblig'd himself to maintain in the Holy-War. Wherefore having laid down a considerable part of the Money he ow'd 'em, he persuaded the Princes to stay for the rest, and defer their Departure 'till the next Spring, without which it would be impossible for him to furnish 'em with the Shipping and Troops he had promis'd ; for that he was not firmly establish'd in his Empire, since his Uncle was still in Thrace, supported by a strong Party who continu'd in their Duty to him, and Theodorus Lascaris had a great Body of Troops on the other side the Bosphorus in Bithynia. He therefore desir'd 'em to perfect the Work they had so happily begun, and fix that Throne in Safety, on which they had plac'd him with so much

Gene-

Generosity; promising in the mean time plentifully to furnish 'em with whatever was necessary for the Subsistence of their Army, and pay the Venetians all their Charges in maintaining the Fleet during the War.

To this the Princes readily agreed, and that the Remainder of the Year might be employ'd to the best Advantage, they march'd against Alexius, who had seiz'd on Adrianople, from whence they drove him, and forc'd him to search for a more secure Retreat elsewhere. After which they reduc'd the greatest part of Thrace, and the Winter approaching they return'd full of Glory to Constantinople, which had been reduc'd almost to Ashes in their Absence, by a terrible Conflagration occasion'd by some Latin Soldiers, who in a drunken Fit plunder'd the Houses and a Mosque of the Saracens, which the late Emperor had scandalously allow'd 'em to build in the Imperial City. The Saracens, supported by the Greeks, the sworn Enemies of the Latins, flew upon this small Number of disorderly Soldiers, and press'd 'em so hard, that some of 'em, more desperately brutish than the rest, set Fire to a Row of wooden Houses that stood upon the Key the better to favour their Escape. It is impossible to express the horrible Ravage this dreadful Fire made, for expanding its Flames in an instant in those Tinder Buildings, it ran on in a Train like Wildfire from Street to Street, 'till it grew Masterless, and consum'd the most stately Edifices, the magnificent Palaces, and capacious Store-houses of that opulent City.

*A dreadful
Conflagra-
tion.*

This horrible Conflagration seem'd a certain Pre-sage of the approaching Ruin of the Grecian Empire, which God thought fit to punish for their many infamous Treasons committed against the first Adventurers in the Holy-War, and to translate it to the French, as he did shortly after, and that at a time when it seem'd ready to recover part of its ancient Beauty and Vigour. The Manner was as follows.

There was at that time at Constantinople one of the Illustrious House of Ducas, whose Name was Alexius, and commonly call'd Murtzuphle, by reason of his Eyebrows join'd and hung very thick over his Eyes, which was always consider'd as a Mark of an ill Man; and indeed History can hardly afford one who had a blacker Soul, or more savage Nature, or who would attempt more abominable Treasons for the Accomplishment of his own Ends. Following the Example of the late Usurper, whom he had serv'd against Isaac, he thought it no difficult Matter to make himself Master of the Empire, especially at so happy a Conjunction, when Isaac the old Emperor, who could not endure so sudden and unexpected a Change, was just deceas'd, and Alexius had render'd himself obnoxious to the People by his great Familiarity and Friendship shown to the Latins: He rightly concluded that his first Step was by Popularity, to ingratiate himself with the discontented Multitude; he therefore seem'd to lament the hard Condition of the Empire, engag'd by a Boy to a covetous and proud Nation, their implacable Enemies; he said Alexius had already given 'em the rich Island of Crete, and oblig'd the Greek Church to yield to the See of Rome, and was now preparing new Exactions to satisfy the insatiable Latins.

A. D.
1204.

A Remonstrance of this Nature, urg'd by a Man of Murtzuphle's Quality, had its desir'd Effect upon the unconstant Greeks, who could not hear the Name of a Latin without Grief and Horror, esteeming them the Cause of all their Miseries, especially of the late Desolation of their City. When this was done, he, being a Man of a most supple and smooth Conversation, presently convey'd himself into the Esteem and Affections of Alexius, who being weak and unexperienc'd made this Traitor his only Confident. Having thus by a double Artifice impos'd both upon the Prince and the People, he first perswaded the miserable Alexius, who acted wholly by his Councils, and esteem'd him as an

an Oracle, to disoblige the Princes; and when they, who were justly provok'd at his unhandsome Behaviour, began to punish him with Acts of Hostility, he then procur'd a Deputation for himself to go to the Marquis of Montferrat, to whom he promis'd, in behalf of the deluded Prince, and by his Order, to deliver to him the Palace and Fortrefs of Blaquernes, as a Pawn of his Fidelity, provided the Princes would forgive what was past, and he would come and deliver him from the impatient Populace, who had by this time proclaim'd another Emperor in his room. The Marquis, not doubting the Concurrence of the other Princes, readily accepted the Proposition; but the Perfidious Murtzuphle, immediately upon his Return the Night following, advertis'd the principal Persons of the City and of the Militia of this Treaty, and by his Agents instructed for that purpose rais'd a Tumult in the City, which, he said, Alexius had sold to the Latins. When he had rais'd the Storm up to the Height he desir'd, he then rush'd at Midnight into the Bed-Chamber, where the unhappy Prince was fast asleep, and having awaken'd him, with a trembling Voice and repeated Sighs he told him that all was lost, that the Commonalty, Nobility, and Gentry, with the Guards, were all ready to fall upon the Palace and cut him in pieces, upon an Intimation that he design'd to deliver up the City to the Latins: Whereupon the amaz'd Prince, wholly abandoning himself to the Conduct of Murtzuphle, that perfidious Villain, who press'd him to save himself, threw about him a Morning Gown, carry'd him through many Windings into the remotest and most secure part of the Palace, from whence some of his Instruments, plac'd there for that purpose, dragg'd him to a loathsome Dungeon, where he liv'd in great Misery for a few Days, 'till the Tyrant, who had attempted his Life several times unsuccessfully by Poison, went himself to the Prison, and cruelly strangled him with his own Hands, the better to secure to himself the Crown, which he immediately Usurp'd.

For

Murtzuphle murders the young Emperor, and Usurps.

For having thus dispos'd of Alexius, he instantly presented himself to the People, to whom he gave an Account of what he had done for the Security of their Liberties, and earnestly exhorted 'em to assist him in the Preservation of 'em, and to make Choice of an Emperor who had Courage enough to defend 'em against the Latins, that were ready to oppress and enslave 'em. Hereupon the Guards, and all those of his Faction, with mighty Acclamations saluted him Emperor, in which they were follow'd by the People, who are apt in all popular Tumults blindly to take those Impressions which are first given 'em.

When this abominable Paricide was discover'd to the Princes, they for the present deferr'd the Enterprize of the Holy-Land, and resolv'd to turn their Arms against the Usurper, as well to revenge the horrible Murder committed upon the Person of him they had made Emperor, as to make themselves Masters of Constantinople, a thing the most necessary for the Conquest of the Holy-Land, as had been too evident in all the other Crusades; so that the War began once more both by Sea and Land.

Constantinople
besieg'd by
the Princes,

The Tyrant, who had been bred a Soldier, and knew his Safety entirely depended upon a vigorous Defence, fail'd not of giving all necessary Orders for it. Notwithstanding which the Princes, who were not much concern'd at his Preparations, resolv'd upon a general Assault, which they made on the eighth of April; and tho', animated by an ardent Desire which they had, and a certain Hope of taking that Day the richest City in the World, the Soldiers did Miracles upon that Occasion, yet the Number of the Defendants being infinite in Comparison of the Assailants, they were forc'd to retreat about three in the Afternoon, after they had lost several brave Men, and a great many Engines of Battery. Notwithstanding which the same Night in a Council of War they resolv'd upon a second Assault, concluding that that the French should be intermix'd with the Venetians both by Sea and Land, that so the two Nations might not lay the blame of a Miscarriage, if any should happen, upon one another : Upon Monday therefore, the twelfth of April, they renew'd the Assault with greater Vigour, and after many desperate Attacks and frequent Repulses, some Frenchmen planted their Ensigns upon one of the Towers adjoining to a Hill where the Tyrant was posted, and issu'd out his necessary Orders for the Defence ; which when the rest beheld, as well they who fought on Shore, as those who were on the Gallies to support 'em, were so ashamed to see themselves behind-hand, that some of 'em throwing themselves with Precipitation ashore, whilst others planted the Ladders against the Walls, they all mounted in Shoals, and killing those who in this horrible Disorder made any Resistance, they quickly made themselves Masters of four other Towers, where they likewise planted their victorious Ensigns.

Whilst this was doing, others, who fought upon the Key, enrag'd to think they should be the last in taking Constantinople, with their Rams broke three of the Gates open, and they who were got into the Town over the Walls, open'd some others that were between the Towers they had taken, so that the whole Army enter'd, and drew up in Order within the Walls, where they continu'd in a Condition regularly to attack any that should be commanded to oppose 'em ; 'till finding the Tyrant posted with full speed into the great Palace, which had one Gate upon the Propontis, and that the rest following that Example ran in a dreadful Disorder through the Streets to gain their Houses, then the Victors overthrew and kill'd all they could reach in their first Fury, as it is usual in taking a City by Storm, and made a most dreadful Slaughter among those miserable People.

The Night put a Stop to the Current of this Fury, and the Princes having sounded a Retreat distributed their their Men into three Quarters, where they had Orders to fortifie themselves, not doubting but there was still something more remaining to be done before they gain'd the rest of the City ; but the next Morning they found all their Precautions unnecessary, for instead of being encounter'd with at least an hundred thousand Enemies, as they expected, they were met with nothing but Processions, which from all Quarters of the City came before 'em, bearing the Crosses, the Banners, and Images of their Saints, to implore the Clemency of the Victors.

For whilst the Princes had been distributing their Forces, as was before observ'd, Mutzuphle, following the Example of the Tyrant Alexius, as well in this as his Usurpation, tho' he at first threaten'd to attack the Princes in their Quarters, yet he made his escape by Night upon a Ship provided for that purpose, taking with him the Empress Euphrosyne, the old Usurper's Wife, and her Daughter, the Princess Eudoxia, with whom he was so desperately in Love, that he chose rather to lose his Honour and Dignity than hazard the Loss of her, whom he was resolv'd to enjoy, cost what it would, and for whose sake he abandon'd his lawful Wife.

and plunder'd for a whole Day together.

The Princes, surpriz'd to find Suppliants where they expected Enemies, promis'd them their Lives, their Honour, their Liberty, and one part of their Estates, which they knew by the Laws of War belong'd to all the Conquerors ; and having commanded 'em to retire to their Houses, they gave the Soldiers the Plunder of the City for that Day, but with a strict Charge to shed no Blood, and to preserve the Honour of the Women ; they also commanded 'em to bring all the Spoils into common Repositories, to the end a just Distribution might be made, according to the Merit and Quality of every Person.

From hence we may judge of the mighty Riches of this Imperial City ; for though the Greeks had Time

Time enough, during the Night after the Assault, to hide, as they did, their most valuable Effects, which they afterwards peaceably enjoy'd ; notwithstanding the Fire must needs be suppos'd to have consum'd an infinite deal of Goods and Treasure, besides that the Emperors, and most eminent Persons of the Empire, who had made their escape both by Sea and Land, had carry'd with them what was most portable and precious ; without accounting the Moveables, the Statues, the Pictures, the Jewels, and other Things of mighty Value, and that part of the Booty which most of the Soldiers reserv'd to themselves, notwithstanding all the Prohibitions to the contrary, yet the French had distributed among them above four hundred thousand Marks in Silver, after the Venetians, who had half of the Spoils, had receiv'd their Share, and a fourth Part of the whole had been reserv'd for him who should be chosen Emperor ; so that both the Officers and Soldiers, who were before reduc'd to an extream Necessity of all Things, became that Day rich, and in an Instant exchange'd their Want for a most prodigious Plenty.

Thus the City of Constantinople, the most famous in the East, the Seat and Glory of the Eastern Empire, through the miserable Dissention of the Greeks for Sovereignty, fell under the Power of the Latins, eight hundred seventy four Years after the Removal of the Imperial Seat from Rome thither by Constantine the Great ; seven hundred twenty eight after the Failure of the Western Empire in Augustulus ; four hundred and four after the Re-establishment of it by Charles the Great ; one hundred and six from the first Expedition of the Princes for the Recovery of the Holy-Land ; the twenty fifth of Philip Augustus, King of France ; and fifth of John, King of England ;
An. Dom. 1204.

C H A P. V.

From the Expulsion of the Greek Emperors out of Constantinople, 'till their Restoration,

Containing the Space of Sixty Years.

IN THO' the Latins had in this manner expell'd the Greeks, and made themselves Masters of Constantinople, yet the Byzantine Empire was not thereby dissolv'd, but divided; for Theodorus Lascaris, having escap'd during the general Confusion to Adrianople, fled afterwards into Bithynia, where he was joyfully receiv'd by the Inhabitants, not only of that Country, but of Phrygia, Misia, Ionia, and Lydia, from the Windings of the River Mæander Southward to the Euxine Sea. At the same time David and Alexius Comneni, the late Tyrant Andronicus's Grand-Children, seizing on the more Eastern Provinces of Pontus, Galatia, and Cappadocia, founded a new Empire, and fix'd their Imperial Seat at Trapezus, or Trapezond, where their Posterity flourish'd, and maintain'd the Honour and Majesty of the Empire in an higher Degree than the Constantinopolitans themselves; 'till the Time of David the last Emperor, in whose Reign it was abolish'd by Mahomet the Great, who led the poor Prince prisoner to Constantinople, where he was cruelly murder'd.

But to return to Constantinople, where the Princes, after some Debates, proceeded to the Election of a new Emperor; for which Purpose twelve Electors had formerly been nam'd, at the same time that they had resolv'd to besiege the City, six of which were Venetians, and six French. After some Deliberation the Choice fell upon Baldwin Earl of Flanders, a Prince who had all those admirable Qualities lities requisite to an Emperor, which never fail to attract the Esteem, Veneration, Love and Affections of his Subjects, and who was accordingly Crown'd in the Church of Sancta Sophia, with all the Magnificence usual at the Coronation of the Emperors, and with the Applause and Acclamations of the Latins and Greeks. To him the Princes assign'd, with the Imperial City of Constantinople, all the Country of Thrace, and a limited Sovereignty over the rest; after which they proceeded to a Division and Distribution of the other Lands and Provinces of the Empire: Thessaly was erected into a Kingdom, for Boniface, Marquis of Montferrat; the Venetians had the Isles of the Archipelago, great Part of the Peloponnesus, with many Cities upon the Coasts of the Hellespont and Phrygia, together with the Isle of Crete, or Candia, which they purchas'd from the Marquis of Montferrat, to whom it had been given by the young Alexius. Liberal Shares were allotted to the other Adventurers, proportionable to the Charges they had been at in the Expedition.

Baldwin
Earl of Flanders, chosen Emperor of Constantinople by
the Princes.

This mighty Alteration in the Constantinopolitan Empire, was attended with such Consequences as usually accompany all violent Mutations. The Greeks, who bore with Impatience the Latin Yoke, took all Opportunities of asserting their Liberties; and when Baldwin, the new Emperor, had reduc'd all Thrace except Adrianople, thither the better sort of the discontented Greeks fled as to a Sanctuary and Refuge, from the prevailing Power of the Latins. On the other side Baldwin, who knew of what Consequence a Place so considerable as that was would be to him, thought it proper to reduce it whilst his Friends were near to assist him, and therefore closely besieg'd it. Those within defended themselves with a Resolution hardly to be equall'd, whilst others of their Nation, who had withdrawn into Bulgaria, solicited John, the King of that Country, to relieve 'em; and John, being assisted by the Scythians, readily

A. D.
1206.

Baldwin
besieges Adrianople,

readily embark'd himself in their Quarrel. Wherefore marching at the Head of a gallant Army to their Relief, as he approach'd the City he detach'd a Party of Scythians, who were well acquainted with a Service of that Nature, to draw the Emperor, if possible, out of his Intrenchments, and by a pretended Flight intice him into a Place among Woods and Mountains, where the King had planted himself and the rest of his Army in order to entrap him. This Design was attended with the Success desir'd, the whole Army was overthrown with a great Slaughter, and Baldwin himself taken Prisoner, by which means the City was reliev'd : But the Bulgarians, after this Victory, greedily pursu'd their good Fortune, and with an inhuman Barbarity over-ran all the open Country, laying all the wealthy Cities of Thrace waste and desolate, except Adrianople and Didymothicum, which were valiantly defended by the Greeks and Latins who had escap'd this Fury of the Barbarians ; so dangerous it is for a People, even in the last Extremity, to call Foreigners into their Assistance, who usually pay themselves for their Service at the Expence of those they have preserv'd : As for the unhappy Emperor himself, he was sent bound to Ternova, or Ernoe, the Capital of Bulgaria, where shortly after, having his Hands and Feet first cut off by the King's Command, he was thrown into a Valley, where he lay in excessive Misery for three Days together, at the End of which he dy'd, and was devour'd by the Wild Beasts and Birds of Prey.

and is put
to a cruel Death.

Nicetas.

This was the unhappy End of Baldwin, the first Emperor of the Latins in Constantinople, whose Reign was not more short and troublesom, than his Death was cruel, and beyond all Imagination terrible. He was a Prince whom the Greek Historian himself, who we may imagine was not over partial to his Memory, allows to have been of an exemplary Piety towards God, of admirable Charity and Goodness towards his Subjects, especially the poor and miserable ; a great Lover of Justice, and so nicely Chaste, that as he never bestow'd any amorous Glances upon any other Woman but his own Wife, so did he forbid, by publick Proclamation twice every Week, those who had in any manner violated the Laws of Chastity to continue in his Court. His extraordinary Temperance had so well manag'd his Constitution, that he was able with great Chearfulness to support all the Fatigues of War, and Inconveniences of Life.
great

In the meantime Lascaris found it no easie matter to settle and secure himself in his new Empire at Nice; it was long before the People would allow him the Imperial Title, and even after he was declar'd Emperor, he found many of his own Nation who pretended as just a Right to that Dignity, and endeavour'd to deprive him of it; tho' none appear'd more dangerous than his own Father-in-Law, the late Ufurper Alexius: Who having, shortly after the Reduction of Constantinople, been taken Prisoner by Boniface, who sent him under a strong Guard into Montferrat, found Means to escape from thence, and passing over into Asia, the perfidious Dotard stirr'd up the Turks against the new Emperor, tho' he had marry'd his own Daughter; and the Turks, pretending what they did was in Vindication of Alexius the rightful Emperor, grievously infested the Territories of this new Empire, and added several Places of great Strength to their own Dominions. Whereupon the Emperor march'd at the Head of two thousand Men, the most he was able in that Exigence to raise, to the Relief of Antioch upon the Mæander, which standing upon that great River, the Boundary of his Empire, would open a Way for the Turks into the Heart of his Dominions, should he suffer it to fall into their Hands. In a Battel which was here fought between 'em, Fathatines, the Sultan of Iconium, was slain by the Emperor's own Hand, as some have written, and Alexius was taken and clapp'd up into a Monastery, where he had Time to reflect on the Miseries ries with which he had involv'd his Country, and to finish his Life in Repentance.

Z

Lascares, having thus overthrown the Turks, concluded a Peace with them, and had time to settle his State, and secure his Dominions against Henry, the Brother of the late Emperor Baldwin, and his Successor at Constantinople. The War was continu'd between 'em with various Success for several Years, being both Princes of great Courage and Sagacity, as indeed the State of both their Empires seem'd at that time particularly to require.

For during the Confusions which immediately ensu'd the Loss of Constantinople, several Princes of the Imperial Family erected to themselves independent Principalities, where they exercis'd a Sovereign Power, and treated not only the Latins, but the Greeks as their Enemies, who would not acknowledge their Subjection; by which means this miserable Nation, being divided in it self, was the less able to oppose the Latins, who confirm'd themselves in their Dominion under the Administration of this Emperor Henry, and oblig'd Lascares at last to own their Authority, and conclude a Peace with them.

Nor was Lascares the only Enemy Henry had to contend with during his Reign; for Michael Angelus, a Prince nearly related to the late Emperors, having seiz'd on Ætolia and Epirus, of which he declar'd himself Despot, was succeeded by his Brother Theodorus, who was a Man of great Designs, and impatiently bore the Domination of the Latins, with whom he constantly warr'd, and took several Towns from 'em on that Side, which he added to his own Dominions.

Henry the Latin Emperor, em-barass'd in his Affairs.

This War continu'd during the whole Reign of this Emperor, who was at that time busy'd with Affairs of the greatest Importance at home. The Latins, having made themselves Masters of Constantinople, did not only declare Baldwin Emperor, but promoted Thomas Morefini, a Venetian to the Patriarchate, whose Creation

Creation being shortly after authoriz'd by Pope Innocent, the Greek Church was by that means reunited to the Latin; but this was done so much against the Inclination of the Greek Ecclesiasticks, that they omitted no Opportunity of declaring how far they were from complying with it; and when Pelagius was sent from Rome to receive their Submission in the Pope's Name, they oppos'd him so resolutely, that the angry Legate caus'd several of 'em to be clapp'd up in Prison, which threw all Constantinople into an Uproar. The Monks in a Remonstrance to Henry told him, That in Things Temporal they had willingly subjected themselves to him, and were ready to obey him; but in Things Spiritual they had a Sovereign Pontiff of their own, who exacted their Obedience, and for that Reason they could not submit themselves to the Bishop of Rome. Henry was naturally of a pacifick Temper, and was unwilling to oppress those whom by his Office he was bound to protect; so that, tho' he had great Veneration for the Pope's Authority, yet he chose rather at present to oppose the Legate, than run the Hazard of a popular Insurrection; wherefore he releas'd such as had been committed, which appeas'd the Tumult, but could not put an end to the Contests and Divisions that continu'd for a long time after.

In the mean time Lascaris, having concluded a Peace, as is before observ'd, with the Latin Emperor at Constantinople, not only fortify'd his chief Cities against the Invasion of his Enemies, as well Turks as Latins, but endeavour'd to secure himself by such Alliances as he thought would prove most serviceable to the present Face of his Affairs. He had three Daughters by his first Wife Ann, one of which he had marry'd to the King of Hungary, and Irene, who was the Eldest, having bury'd her first Husband Andronicus Palæologus, was now marry'd to John Ducas, turnam'd Batatza, or Vataces, a Man of great Authority and no less Merit in his Court, whom he design'd

Lascaris
appoints his Successor,
John Ducas Vataces.

sign'd for his Successor ; for tho' he had a Son by his second Wife, who was an Armenian by Birth, yet he being an Infant was judg'd unable to sit at the Helm of State in such Times of Danger, and that when the Empire it self was in its Infancy.

After this we meet with little memorable during the Reign of this Emperor, but we ought not to conclude it 'till we have given the Reader a brief Account of the Fortunes of the Latin Princes, that reign'd in his Time in Constantinople. To Baldwin, the first of those Emperors, succeeded Henry of Heinault, as has been before observ'd, who maintain'd the Empire with great Glory and Success for ten Years together, and dy'd a Conqueror ; after his Death, Peter of Auxerre, who had marry'd his Sister, and signaliz'd himself upon several extraordinary Occasions, was unanimously chosen to succeed him. This Prince arriving at Rome in his Way to Constantinople, was solemnly crown'd there, together with his Wife, by Pope Honorius III. in the Beginning of April, An. 1217. and having sent his Wife and Children before him by Sea, he enter'd into a Treaty with the Venetians, pursuant to which he march'd by the Way of Thessaly and Epirus, and laid Siege to Dyrrachium, which was then in the Possession of Theodorus Comnenus, Prince of Epire, and in whose Behalf it was vigorously defended by the Garrison that was in it. So that being forc'd to raise the Siege, he came to an Agreement with Theodorus, who promis'd him a safe Passage to Constantinople, but set suddenly upon him in Macedonia, took him and the Principal Officers of his Court Prisoners, and put him to Death in the Year following. The Greek Writers, who are partial to their Countrymen, vary from this Account in some Particulars, and tell us that he was slain in an Engagement, and endeavour by that means to vindicate Theodorus from the Treachery imputed to him by the Latins, who however seem to have a better Authority for what they have written.

Peter, the Latin Emperor, put to Death by Theodorus Com-
nenus.

The Affairs of the Latins in Constantinople became ſo embaras'd by the untimely Death of this Prince, that Philip, Count of Namour, his eldeſt Son, refus'd the Succeſſion ; ſo that Robert of Courtney, his ſecond Son, was in a manner courted to accept of the Imperial Purple, and had the Misfortune to ſee the Empire miſerably diſmember'd in his Time, loſing whatever his Predeceſſors had been Maſters of on the other ſide the Bosphorus and Helleſpont to John Ducas Batatza, of whom mention has been made already, and who ſucceeded Theodorus Laſcaris at Nice.

Laſcaris had govern'd that Part of the Empire the Greeks retain'd in Aſia with great Succeſs for eighteen Years together, during which he acquitted himſelf with great Reputation in all thoſe Difficulties which uſually attend new States ſurrounded with potent Enemies. He had frequent and ſignal Advantages over the Turks, the Latins, and Bulgarians, by which he exceedingly ſtrengthen'd the Empire, which he may in a great meaſure be ſaid to have founded. This made him univerſally belov'd by his Subjects, who, in Imitation of their Prince, profited in the School of Adverſity, and attempted not only to recover the Dominions of their Anceſtors, but to revive their Glory and Military Diſcipline. Before his Death he took care to leave ſuch a Succeſſor behind him, as might be able to preſerve the Reliques of the old Roman Empire, by him collected into one Body, and for that reaſon put by not only his own Son, but his two Brothers, Alexius and Iſaac, therein preferring the publick Weal before his own private Affections, or the aggrandizing of his Family. As he was a Man of many Virtues, ſo was he ſubject to ſome Vices ; being fiery and Impatient, and moſt abominably addicted to the Love of Women. His Liberality and Expences exceeded in the Income of his narrow Eſtate, which made him frequently oppreſs his Subjects with heavy Taxations ;

Z 3      who

who observing in how higher a degree their Neighbours on every side were harass'd and impoverish'd, submitted chearfully, and oftentimes supply'd him with their voluntary Contributions. He dy'd before he was full forty eight Years of Age, and after he had reign'd about eighteen, in the first of Robert Emperor of the Latins in Constantinople, the tenth of Frederick Emperor of Germany, and fifth of Henry III. King of England, A. D. 1221.

A. D.
1221.

Lascaris being dead, John Ducas was crown'd by the Hands of Manuel, Patriarch of the Greek Church at Nice: Being a Man of Spirit, slow in resolving, but indefatigable in the Execution of what he had once resolv'd, the Eyes and Expectations of all his Subjects were fix'd upon him; and upon Experience they found, that the Erection of their new Empire was owing to the Activity of Lascaris, but to support it requir'd the deliberate Care, Prudence, and Circumspection of his Successor Ducas.

John Ducas his Success against the Latins.

This new Emperor, immediately after his Coronation, began to enquire into the State of his Army, and beheld with Regret the narrow Limits of his Empire, which he prepar'd with great Industry to enlarge, he rais'd new Levies, augmented his Legions, and invited such Officers into his Service as he judg'd would be of use to him. Having no less a Design in view than the Recovery of Constantinople it self, and whatever the Latins held in Greece or Thrace, which he knew could not be done without a powerful Navy, he built a great Number of Gallies in the several Ports of Asia, and Mann'd out a strong Fleet, with which in the Course of his Wars he took in most of the Islands in the Ægean Sea, and passing the Hellspont he invaded the Chersonese, and afterwards pierc'd up even to the Gates of Constantinople, to the great Terror of the Latins, who gave an unhappy Beginning to the War themselves: For Alexius and Isaac, the late Emperor's Brothers, offended at the Preference of John, withdrew to Constantinople, where they

they earnestly solicited Aid from the Latins against him, whom they consider'd as no other than an Usurper. Robert, the Latin Emperor, readily undertook their Protection, and having rais'd a formidable Army, committed it to their Conduct: In the mean time John, who had been inform'd of their Designs, prepar'd for their Reception, and engaging with 'em
at a Place call'd Poemanenum, got the Advantage after a long and bloody Dispute, cut off the Flower of the Army, and took the two Brethren Prisoners, who shortly after lost their Eyes by his Command. The Loss of this Victory prov'd a great Stroke to the Affairs of the Latins in the East, as on the other hand it
serv'd to exhilarate and revive the afflicted Greeks,
who receiv'd new Courage from this Success,
and consider'd it as a Pledge of their future Pros-perities.

A. D.
1224.

Assan, or Azen, the King of Bulgaria, who had for some time been equally terrible both to the Latins
and Greeks, was so touch'd with the Reputation of this Prince's Exploits, that he made a voluntary Offer of his Daughter Helena in Marriage to Theodore, the Emperor's Son, which was readily embraced by John; for he knew of what Consequence the Alliance of so powerful a Prince would be, who otherwise was able effectually to stop him in the Course of his Victories, and assist his Enemies against him; so that the Matter was quickly concluded, and the Nuptials celebrated with great Solemnity, tho'
neither the Bride or Bridegroom were at that time
much above ten Years of Age.

He marries his Son to the King of Bulgaria's Daughter.

This Advantageous Alliance was no sooner esta-blish'd, but the Sultan of Iconium sent his Ambassadors to Nice, to confirm and prolong the Truce between the two Crowns. The Sultan was at this time grievously straitn'd by the Tartars, who having driven the Turks out of Persia, and the more Eastern Provinces, began now to press hard upon 'em in the lesser Asia; and the Sultan fearing lest he should be assaulted and concludes a Peace with

the Turks.

assaulted by the Greeks at a time when all his Forces were oppos'd to so potent an Enemy, earnestly courted the Emperor to a Peace; to which John, upon weighty Considerations, readily inclin'd: For he not only knew how difficult it would be for him to contend with the Turks in Asia, at the same time that he was engag'd with the Latins in Europe, but he was also willing to preserve the former, as a Barrier to his Dominions, against the more prevailing Power of the Tartars.

Theodore.
Prince of Epire, press'd hard upon the Latins,

About this Time, whilst the Emperor John Ducas distress'd the Latins on one side, Theodorus Comnenus, Prince or Despot of Epire, press'd 'em with equal Vigour and Success on the other. He took from 'em all Thessaly, and Thrace, and so far enlarg'd his Dominions, that disdaining a more moderate Title, he assum'd that of Emperor, and was crown'd by the Hands of Demetrius, Arch-Bishop of Bulgaria, with which both the Pope and the Greek Patriarch were highly offended, whilst Vataces rather silently permitted, than approv'd or condemn'd what had been done. But Theodorus his Success had transported him beyond all Prudence and Moderation, and render'd him so arrogant and presumptuous, that tho' he had lately concluded a perpetual Peace with John, the Son of Azen, King of Bulgaria, and marry'd his Brother Manuel to that Prince's Daughter, yet this restless, haughty, imperious Spirit, impatient of Restraint, broke through all, and in Defiance of the Peace lately confirm'd, declar'd War against John, whom he consider'd as a petty Prince, unable to oppose so renown'd a Conqueror. Having rais'd a powerful Army, consisting of Latins as well as Greeks, he enter'd Bulgaria, where he receiv'd an entire Defeat, lost the most experienc'd Officers of his Army, and was himself taken Prisoner by the Conqueror, who order'd him to be blinded, as a just Reward for his Perfidiousness and Ambition.

But is overthrown and blinded by the Bulga- rians.

By this time the Emperor John Vataces had so effectually weaken'd the Latins, during the Reign of their unactive Prince Robert, that they were glad to sue for a Peace, which upon advantageous Conditions was granted 'em ; and the Subjects of the Empire being now deliver'd from a long and bloody War, continu'd for several Years, sometimes with the Turks, at others with the Christians, apply'd themselves with great Industry to the fruitful Arts of Peace, in which the Emperor himself became a most remarkable Example, and earnestly encourag'd all his Subjects to follow it. He not only supply'd his own Household with the Fruits of his Husbandry, but daily reliev'd the Poor, and stock'd great Store-houses with the Overplus. From him this commendable Industry deriv'd it self, as from a Fountain to the rest, so that in a few Years every Granery was stor'd with Corn, every Cellar fill'd with Wine, and a general Plenty shin'd throughout the Land ; and this at a time when the Turks were pinch'd with a grievous Famine, who therefore had Recourse to the Emperor's Territories for Provisions, which they purchas'd at whatever Price the Christians thought fit to demand for 'em ; this in a short time fill'd the Countrymen's Houses with the Wealth of the Turks, and stor'd the Emperor's Coffers with their Treasure, for they were forc'd in that Extremity to part not only with their Gold and Silver, but their Jewels, and whatever else they had of a more precious Value. And it is not a Matter the least remarkable during this Emperor's Reign, that so much Money was collected in a short time by the Sale of Eggs, as serv'd to make the Empress an Imperial Crown of Gold adorn'd with Oriental Pearl and Jewels of an inestimable Value.

The Effects of Peace.

A. D.

1228.

About this time dy'd Robert, Emperor of the Latins in Constantinople, after an unfortunate Reign of Seven Years, during which he saw his Countrymen weaken'd and distress'd more than ever they had been before.

*Robert,
the Emperor of Con-
stantino-
ple, dies.*

He

A barbarous Outrage committed upon the Person of the Empress.

He dy'd in Achaia, as he was returning from Rome, where he had been to be Crown'd in a more solemn manner by the Pope, as some have written ; tho' others say his Business there was to complain of a barbarous Outrage committed upon his beautiful Empress by a Burgundian Lord, to whom she had been contracted formerly, but had deserted him at the Instigation of her Mother, who was charm'd with the Honour of the Imperial Bed : For this Reason the incens'd Lover cut off her Nose and Ears, and threw her ambitious Mother into the Sea. Tho' this Account be true in Substance, yet 'tis most probable this Barbarity was committed during the Absence of the Emperor, whose Power and Authority, had he been present, might have been sufficient to have protected the unhappy Princess from so inhuman a Treatment. However it were, the Sense of it struck so deep into his Mind, that it hasten'd his Death, and left the Burgundian to triumph unpunish'd in his bloody Revenge.

Baldwin II. succeeds. Robert being dead, Baldwin, the second that of Name, succeeded him being his Son, as most of the Latin Writers will have it, or rather his Brother, as we learn from more Authentick Accounts. This Prince was, at Robert's Death, no more than eight Years of Age, for which Reason 'twas judg'd necessary to marry him to some Lady, an Alliance with whose Family might prove a Support to his tender Years and the declining Empire.

From the time that the Latins had driven the Greeks out of Constantinople, an Emulation and Enmity had been preserv'd between the two Imperial Families at Nice and Trabezond, which animated 'em to so high a degree, that nothing but the common Fear they had of the Latins restrain'd 'em from open Acts of Hostility ; so that upon this Occasion Comnenus, the Emperor of Trabezond, earnestly desir'd to marry his Daughter to Baldwin, promising no less than the utter Ruin of John Vataces from such an Alliance.

This

This Offer had undoubtedly been embrac'd by those at Constantinople, had they not still, upon good Grounds, distrust'd the Sincerity of the Greeks: This Consideration made 'em reject the Proposal, and incline to John de Brienne, at that time General of the Pope's Armies in the West, whose Eldest Daughter Jolante had been formerly marry'd to Frederick, the Western Emperor, who depriv'd him of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, to which he had been advanc'd in Right of his Wife Mary, Daughter of Isabella the former Queen. John was at that time, according to the Greek Writers, near eighty Years of Age, of an establish'd Reputation in Arms, being esteem'd one of the greatest Captains in his Time, and an exact Observer of his Word. Him the Lords at Constantinople sent to desire of the Pope for their Emperor, assuring him that after his Death the Succession should return to Baldwin, who was to marry the Princess Mary, or Martha, his Daughter, whom he had by his second Wife Beren-garia, the Daughter of Alphonso King of Castile. By this means John, whose extraordinary Merits had rais'd him first to the Royalty from a private State, and at length advanc'd him to the Imperial Dignity, was receiv'd with great Solemnity at Constantinople: Some say he declin'd the Name of Emperor, contenting himself with that of Cæsar, and Guardian of the Empire; however, since he acted with an Imperial Authority, he is by some added to the Catalogue of their Emperors.

John de Brienne
Guardian
at Con-
stantino-
ple.

Whilst John de Brienne was applying himself in some measure to re-establish the Affairs of his miserable Empire, the Greek Emperor, in Conjunction with John Azen, King of Bulgaria, exceedingly harass'd the Latins, and having recover'd several Towns from the Venetians, as well as the French, they fell with their confederated Forces upon John, who behav'd himself with a Courage and Magnanimity equal to his former Reputation, but was not attended with his usual Success. At first Fortune seem'd to countenance

nance his Labours, for with an handful of Men he overthrew a powerful Army, which had laid close Siege to Constantinople both by Sea and Land; but the continu'd Wars with those two Princes had in time so weaken'd and diminish'd his Forces, that he had no more left than were necessary for the Defence of Constantinople, when he was attack'd with two potent Armies on both Sides, which oblig'd him to shut himself up in the Imperial City, and send the young Emperor Baldwin to solicit in Person Assistance from the Pope, and the Princes in the West, which was at this time miserably distracted by different Factions, especially by the Guelphs and the Gibbelins, who laid waste all the Provinces, and, to satiate their Revenge, bury'd one another under the Ruins of their miserable Country.

A. D.
1237.
where he
dies.

This made Baldwin meet with many Difficulties in his Negotiation, which he zealously pursu'd in Rome, in France, and England; but John, his Father-in-Law, dy'd during these Transactions at Constantinople, after he had receiv'd the Satisfaction of seeing his Enemies defeated by the Venetians, and when he had govern'd as Administrator of the Empire seven Years, according to some, tho' others make it ten, and some extend it even to twenty. The Loss of this Great Man would without doubt have prov'd fatal to the Latins in Constantinople, had not some unhappy Divisions interrupted the Friendship that had been confirm'd between Vataces and Azen, who, in defiance of all former Oaths and Obligations, cunningly recover'd his Daughter he had marry'd to the Emperor's Son, and confederated himself against him with the Latins; which prov'd of ill Consequence to Vataces his Affairs, and would in all probability have recover'd from the Greeks all they held in Europe, and shaken their Empire it self in Asia, if some unfortunate Attempts had not alarm'd the Conscience of the unconstant Azen, and reconcil'd him to his former Engagements.

Shortly

Shortly after this, Azen, having lost his former Wife, who was an Hungarian by Birth, marry'd Irene, the Daughter of Theodorus Angelus, who had formerly usurp'd the Imperial Honours, and having been overthrown by Azen, lost his Eyes by his Order, as we observ'd before, and was now kept in honourable Restraint. This unexpected and advantageous Alliance produc'd a wonderful Alteration in his Fortune, for Azen not only releas'd him, but assisted him in the Recovery of Thessalonica, and all the adjacent Territories, out of which he drove his Brother Manuel, who had govern'd for some time with an independent Authority in those Parts. Being by these Means in a great measure restor'd to his former Power, the blind Prince declin'd the Imperial Title himself, but conferr'd it on his Son John, whom he caus'd to be acknowledg'd and honour'd as Emperor.

The Emperor John Vataces beheld these Transactions with a jealous Eye, but forasmuch as Theodorus was supported by the King of Bulgaria, who was likewise his Allie, he thought he could not at present resent it as he ought, and therefore deferr'd it to a more favourable Opportunity, which shortly after was presented him: For Azen dying, left the Kingdom of Bulgaria to Callimanus, a Son by his former Wife, who being but a Boy was easily persuaded by those of his Court, who were Vataces his Pensioners, to renew the Alliance with the Emperor, and to sit still whilst he saw Vataces strip Theodorus's Son of those Honours with which his Father had invested him. By a wonderful Dexterity he prevail'd with Theodorus to abandon his own Son, and having engag'd the Scythians, who not long before had pierc'd through Bulgaria and settled themselves in Macedon, to espouse his Quarrel, he past over into Thrace, where he recover'd such Towns as were in the Possession of the Mock-Emperor, and forc'd him to abjure his Title, and be contented with that of Despot.

A. D.
1255.

By these Means Vataces recover'd several Places great Consequence, and enlarg'd his Dominions those Parts; and the young King of Bulgaria dy'd shortly after, he extended his Conquests yet farther, and grew almost as powerful in Europe, as he was in Asia.

Vataces
dies.

His Cha-
racter.

The rest of this active Emperor's Reign was spent in the Settlement of his new Conquests, and in frequent Expeditions against those, who having once own'd his Authority perfidiously renounc'd it, and took up Arms against him; in which he was attended with his usual Success, seldom or never attempting any thing which he did not effect. At length, being full of Years, as well as Honours, he paid the last Debt to Nature, after a glorious Reign of thirty three Years, and when he had liv'd upwards of sixty, leaving the Character of a great Soldier, a vigilant Prince, and consummate Statesman, behind him, as appears by his frequent Victories and successful Negotiations. 'Tis observable of him, that in the Beginning of his Reign he was affable, and easie of Access; but having been once alarm'd by a Conspiracy form'd against him, he grew more difficult and reserv'd, to which he was instigated by Irene the Empress, a Woman of a Temper manly and imperious. Tho' he was an indulgent Master, yet was he more liberal to Strangers and Ambassadors than his own Subjects and Servants, as desiring to be renown'd for his Magnificence abroad rather than at home. After the Death of Irene, who dy'd several Years before him, he marry'd Ann, the King of Sicily's Sister, who had in her Service a Lady of an uncommon Beauty, call'd Marcesina, with whose Love the Emperor grew so much ensnar'd, that she became absolute in his Affections. Whilst he was in the Possession of this Dotage, the fair Favourite reign'd with almost an unlimited Authority, equalling the Empress in State and Magnificence, and by far exceeding her in her Followers and Attendants; 'till straining her Power too far, the aged Emperor at length became ashamed

of

of his Folly, and his Mistress fell into Disgrace. Vatases dy'd in the twenty eighth Year of Baldwin II. the twentieth of Lewis IX. King of France, and thirty eighth of Henry III. King of England, A. D. 1255.

John Ducas Vatases being dead, his Son Theodorus Lascaris, who was about thirty three Years of Age, succeeded him in the Empire. The Beginning of this Prince's Reign was remarkable for the Treaty renew'd between him and the Sultan of Iconium; to which he more readily inclin'd, because he was inform'd that his Brother-in-Law, the King of Bulgaria, and Michael Angelus the Despot, hearing of his Father's Death, had rais'd new Troubles in Macedonia and Thrace, not without Hope at length of joining what the Emperor held in Europe to their own Territories. Whereupon having first provided for the Security of his Affairs in Asia, he pass'd the Hellespont with a powerful Army, and acted with so much Courage and Success, that those Princes were glad to accept of a Peace upon his own Terms, and restore whatever they had taken from him. Whilst he lay at Thessalonica he receiv'd Letters from Nice, informing him that Michael Palæologus, whom he had left for his Lieutenant in Asia during his Absence, had secretly withdrawn to the Turks; with which he was the more concern'd, because he knew Michael was a Man of great Interest and Authority, being descended from no less than five Imperial Families, and well vers'd in the Arts both of Peace and War.

Theodorus Lascaris II.

Michael Palæologus withdraws to the Turks.

Whilst the Emperor was dreading the Consequences of such a Revolt, he was inform'd that Michael had declar'd that what he did proceeded not from any Disaffection to the Emperor, or Ill-will towards him, but that he had devoted himself to a voluntary Exile, to avoid those Dangers with which he was threaten'd by the implacable Malice of his Enemies, who fill'd the Emperor's Ears with odious Complaints against him, and render'd him suspected to his Master.

Palæo-

The Turks
tributary to the Tartars.

Palæolo-
gus re-call'd home.

Palæologus was receiv'd with an hearty Welcome to the Turks at Iconium, where he found the Sultan busy'd in his Preparations against the Tartars, who having driven the Turks out of Persia, pursu'd their Fortune, and by their continual Incursions harass'd their Territories in the lesser Asia, lying now with a formidable Army at Axara, a Town not far from Iconium. Palæologus had the Command of such Greeks as had enter'd into the Sultan's Pay, with which he did such Service in the Battel that was fought shortly after, that the Tartars had been absolutely defeated, if a Turkish Officer, who had a principal Command in the Army, and was nearly related to the Sultan, had not revolted in the Heat of the Action, and turn'd the Fortune of the Day. After this the Tartars rovd up and down without Control, plundering and destroying all the Provinces belonging to the Turks, whilst no one had the Strength or Courage to oppose 'em. In this Extremity the Sultan fled for Aid to Theodorus the Emperor, who granted him such Supplies as he could well spare; notwithstanding which the Tartars still prevail'd in all Parts, 'till at length they forc'd the Turks to accept of a dishonourable Peace, and become Tributaries to 'em.

Palæologus had acquir'd so extraordinary a Reputation in these Wars, that the Emperor earnestly desir'd to recover so deserving a Servant, and by kind and gracious Letters, attended with most solemn Promises for his Security, invited him home. Whereupon Palæologus, having first taken an Oath of Obedience and Fidelity to the Emperor and his Son, and oblig'd himself never to aspire after the Empire, or encourage any Innovations, return'd with great Joy home, where he was restor'd to the Emperor's Favour, and all his former Honours and Employments.

Theodorus had great reason to exact that Oath from Palæologus, whose Ambition was almost equal to the Interest he had in the Empire. The Emperor himself declin'd declin'd daily in his Health, and his Son was not then six Years of Age, which were Temptations sufficient to try the Temper of a Man less aspiring than Palæologus, who made it appear shortly after how difficult it is for Men to be restrain'd by Oaths, tho' never so solemnly made, when they oppose them in their Pursuit to Empire.

The Emperor, perceiving that Death approach'd, recommended the Care of the young Prince his Son, and of the Empire, to his chief Favourite Muzalo, and Arsenius the Patriarch; exacting at the same time an Oath of Fidelity from the Nobility and Principal Officers in his Army. When this was done, he dy'd full of Prophetick Fears of what follow'd afterwards, when he had reign'd not three Years compleat, according to some, or as others will have it, upwards of four. Some time before his Death he took the Monastick Habit, dispos'd great Sums of Money to the Poor, and sincerely apply'd himself to Acts of Devotion. His Death was usher'd in by a remarkable Eclipse of the Sun, which was so great that Stars appear'd at Noon-Day. He dy'd in the thirty third of Lewis IX. King of France, forty third of Henry III. King of England, A. D. 1259.

The Emperor dies.

Man often by his Prudence can foresee, what it is not in his Power with all his Care to prevent. Theodorus, before his Death, made that Provision for the Security of his Son and the State, as became a Father and an Emperor, but the Will of God was otherwise, and all his Precautions were in effectual.

Michael Palæologus.

Muzalo, one of the young Prince's Guardians, was a Person of obscure Birth, but having been educated in the Court from his Youth with the late Emperor, he was so entirely affected to him, that he did nothing without first consulting his faithful Favourite, who was a diligent Observer of his Will, a ready Minister of his Affairs, and the uncorrupted Partner of all his Secrets. This * Man, tho' he worthily deserv'd the * Muzalo, Guardian to the young Prince, envy'd by the Nobility.

Trust the Emperor had repos'd in him, was however envy'd by the Nobility, who presuming upon their high Birth, thought the Care and Tuition of the young Prince belong'd more properly to some of them. This kindled in 'em an irreconcilable Hatred to Muzalo, and that was follow'd shortly after by an Aversion to the unhappy young Prince himself. Muzalo, who was a Man of a just and ready Apprehension, soon perceiv'd how disagreeable he was to the discontented Nobility; whom therefore having summoned together, he in a set Speech represented to 'em the great Trust had been repos'd in him by the late Emperor, how difficult he found the Execution of that Trust to be, and how ready he was to resign it to such of them as they should in their Prudence think fit to appoint for the Execution of it. Tho' this was what all of them desir'd, yet none among 'em appearing ready to accept of it, they unanimously agreed no one was so worthy of that Charge as himself, and therefore they resolv'd it should be continu'd to him. Muzalo, who sincerely desir'd to retire to a private Life, and withdraw himself from the Dangers with which he saw he was threaten'd, oppos'd 'em at first with great Resolution; but when all he could say or do was to no purpose, he then once more receiv'd a solemn Oath from 'em, and suffer'd himself to be confirm'd in his Charge, every one swearing to defend and obey the young Emperor to the utmost of their Power, and support and protect Muzalo in the Tuition of him, and the Administration of the Empire.

Notwithstanding all these repeated Asseverations, they grew in a Moment forgetful of whatever they had sworn, and resolv'd upon the Death of him whom they had just before declar'd Protector of the Emperor and Empire. The Day appointed for this Sacrifice to their Envy and Discontents was that which had been design'd for the Obsequies of the late Emperor, at which time the Conspirators repair'd to the Abby
of

of Sofandra, where Theodorus was to be interr'd, mixing themselves among an infinite Multitude of People, who had resorted thither, as it is usual at such Solemnities; and in the midst of the Holy Office, at a Word given, they with their drawn Swords pursu'd Muzalo, who, with his two Brothers, Andronicus and Theodorus, had fled for Refuge to the Altar, where they were most inhumanly massacred: And tho' the Matrons appointed for Mourners fled away in great Confusion, yet these Butchers forc'd the Monks, who were flying with the rest, to return and finish the bloody Obsequies. and is murder'd.

Muzalo being thus barbarously remov'd, Arsenius was left sole Guardian to the young Prince. This Prelate was a Person of great Learning and Integrity, but having from his Youth led a retir'd contemplative Life, was a Stranger to State-Affairs, and the Management of an headstrong ungovernable People; wherefore he call'd those very Persons to Council, who had plotted the Death of his Colleague, with whom he consulted what was to be done in that Exigency.

In this Council it manifestly appear'd of how much Palæologus was among 'em; to him they directed all their Discourses, and fix'd their Eyes on him, as a Man the most proper, for his Wisdom and Experience, to be entrusted with the Care of the young Prince, and the Management of the State. The Patriarch had some time before made him Pay-master of the Army, by vertue of which Trust he had a mighty Treasure at Command, and was by that means able to oblige such as he thought would prove the fittest for his Purpose, and with the first Opportunity favour his ambitious Designs. He was therefore upon this Occasion unanimously declar'd Protector of the Prince and Empire, and by that means invested with so large a Power, that he wanted nothing but the Title of Emperor. Palæologus aspires, and is declar'd Protector.

This extraordinary good Fortune might have satisfy'd any Man of less aspiring Thoughts than Palæologus. That the World might see how worthy he was of those Honours to which he was advanc'd, by a timely Care he check'd the Insolence of Michael Angelus, Despot of Epirus, who presuming upon the Distractions of the State after the Death of the late Emperor, and being supported by the King of Sicily and some other of his Allies, had enter'd with a powerful Army into Macedonia and Thrace, burning and destroying all before him. Palæologus sent his Brother John at the Head of a considerable Body of Forces against him, who was attended with so much Success, that Michael, after a great Loss, was forc'd to retire into his own Territories, leaving the Flower of his Army dead behind him.

and crowned Emperor.

A. D.
1260.

The Reputation of this considerable Service strengthen'd the Authority of Palæologus, who apply'd all to the perfecting his own ambitious Designs. He had by this time so far prevail'd upon the good Opinion of the People, especially some of the most powerful among the Nobility and Clergy, that he was with a general Applause saluted Emperor; and tho' the Patriarch Arsenius was in no manner consenting to what had been done, but threaten'd at first to Excommunicate both Palæologus and his Adherents, yet was he at length either perswaded or terrify'd into a Compliance, and having first exacted an Oath of Resignation when the young Emperor should be of Age, he condescended to Crown Michael, whom he would have the World esteem as Emperor only in Trust, and as a Guardian accountable to another, so soon as he should be in a Capacity of demanding that Account from him.

Whatever the good Patriarch's Designs were, Palæologus made it appear, in the Event, that he had other things in view, and that he intended to enjoy that as his own, which Arsenius would be thought to have conferr'd upon him only as a Proxy. Being thus settled and confirm'd in his new Authority, he apply'd himself not only to the Security of his present Dominions, but to the Recovery of such others as had formerly merly belong'd to his Predecessors. Among those who had been taken Prisoners by his Brother John in Macedonia was the Prince of Peloponnesus and Achaia, who having marry'd Michael Angelo's Daughter, was by vertue of that Alliance drawn into his Quarrel; this Prince was brought Prisoner to Nice, immediately after the Coronation of Palæologus, and that Emperor would not be prevail'd upon to release him, 'till he had deliver'd up to him Sparta and two other Cities of great Consequence in Peloponnesus; all which being esteem'd very serviceable to his future Designs, were committed to the Care of his Brother Constantine, a vigilant and experienc'd Officer, who shortly after recover'd several other Towns from the Latins, and by degrees reduc'd the greatest part of Peloponnesus. When this was done, the Emperor in Person pass'd with a great Army over into Thrace, with a design to lay Siege to Constantinople it self; which when he perceiv'd it was a thing too extraordinary to be at that time attempted, he laid Siege to the Castle of Pera; the Conquest of which he knew would prove of dangerous Consequence to the Town it self. Here he met with so vigorous a Resistance, that after he had been several times repuls'd, he found himself oblig'd to retire; but before he return'd home, he took Care so effectually to dispose his Soldiers in Garrison up and down in those Parts, that Constantinople was in a manner block'd up, and the Inhabitants so restrain'd by the Incursions which Palæologus's Soldiers made up to the very Gates of the City, that in a short time they were reduc'd to the greatest Extremities, being, among other Necessities oblig'd to burn some of the most beautiful Houses in the City for want of Fuel. Palæologus, in the mean time, return'd to Nice, where he continu'd forming new Designs, 'till Michael Angelo rais'd fresh Troubles in the West, and Chance presented him with an Opportunity of obtaining what with all his Care he had not been able to effect.

A. D.
1261.

Alexius
Stratego-pulus sent
against the Despot of Epire.

Palæologus made Choice of Alexius Strategopulus, a Man of great Nobility, and who, for his extraordinary Services, had been dignify'd with the Title of Cæsar, to command against the Despot, sending with him no more than eight hundred Bithynian Soldiers, but gave him a Commission to raise more in his March, and Orders, as soon as he had pass'd the Streights, to take his Way through the Suburbs of Constantinople, on purpose to terrifie the Latins, whom he was willing to confine, if possible, within their Walls, and by frequent Alarms to keep 'em still upon their Duty.

The fortunate Alexius encamp'd with his handful of Men at a Place call'd Regium, not far from Constantinople, where he accidentally met with some poor Labourers, Greeks by Nation, by whom he was inform'd of the Condition the City was in, that a great Body of the Latins were gone under the Conduct of a young Venetian Nobleman to the Siege of Daphnusia, a Town lying upon the Euxine Sea, that the Garrison was very weak and ill provided, and that it would be no difficult Matter to surprize it, offering themselves at the same time to be his Guides. These Men liv'd within the City close to one of the Gates, near which was an old Mine, which afforded a secret unsuspected Entrance, unknown to all but themselves: Here they promis'd Alexius to receive in fifty of his Soldiers by Night, who having first secur'd the Watch, might force open the Gate, and prepare an Entrance for the rest of his Army, engaging at the same time to provide a powerful Assistance for 'em among their Friends in the City. The Thing appear'd so reasonable, that Alexius promis'd himself an undoubted Success; having therefore highly commended the Men for their honest Zeal in the Service of their Country, he dismiss'd 'em with liberal Gifts, and encourag'd 'em with large Promises of what they were to expect hereafter, and immediately prepar'd to put that Design in Execution, which had been so happily concerted.

'Tis

'Tis wonderful to consider in what fatal Security Baldwin, the Latin Emperor, liv'd at that time in Constantinople, tho' he was surrounded with Enemies, who had dismember'd his little Empire, and left him Master hardly of any thing but the Imperial City it self. His Poverty was equal to his Security, for it had reduc'd him to the Necessity of selling the publick Ornaments of the City, and pawning his own Son to some Merchants of Bruges, for the Support and Maintenance of his State. We may add to all this, that he was a Man of little Courage and less Authority, contemn'd as well by the Latins as the Greeks, all which contributed to the Revolution that immediately follow'd.

The Night appointed by the poor Greeks being come, Alexius chose out fifty of his most resolute Soldiers, who, according to the Agreement between 'em, were admitted by their faithful Guides into the City, where having slain the Watch, who were in no manner prepar'd for such an Encounter, they forc'd the Gate open, at which Alexius enter'd with all his Army, and a little before Day caus'd the City to be fir'd in four several Places at once, to the great Terror and Amazement of the Latins; who concluding the Numbers of their Enemies to be much greater than indeed they were, had no Courage either to extinguish the Flames, or oppose the Greeks, who being join'd by their Countrymen within the Walls, fill'd every Street with Blood and Slaughter. In this general Confusion the defenceless Emperor, perceiving the Hand of Fate against him, fled with Justinian, the Latin Patriarch, and some other of his Friends, by Sea, first to Eubæa, and afterwards to Venice, quitting the Imperial City to the Greeks, after it had been sixty Years in the Hands of the Latins, by whom it was purchas'd with less Honour than it was lost with Infamy. This happen'd in the second Year of the Emperor Michael Palæologus, the thirty fifth of Lewis IX. of France, and forty fifth of Henry III. King of England, A. D. 1261.

He surprizes Constantinople and expels the Latins.

C H A P. VI.

*From the Restitution of the Empire to the Greeks,
'till the Total Subjection of it by the Turks under Mahomet the Great.*

Containing the Space of 193 Years.

A. D.
1261.

THE Reduction of Constantinople was an Event so considerable, and at the same time so little expected by Palæologus, that he gave no Credit to him who brought the first Express of it; but when frequent Messengers arriv'd with Dispatches to the same purpose, and he had receiv'd Letters from Alexius himself, with a particular Account of it, then he entertain'd it with a Satisfaction suitable to the Occasion, and order'd publick Thanks to be return'd to God; in which the Emperor himself, the Senate, the Clergy, and the People, assisted with great Solemnity and Devotion.

The Emperor removes with his Court to Constantinople.

When this was done, he prepar'd to remove with his whole Court to Constantinople, and to restore the exil'd Majesty of the ancient Byzantine Empire to the Place of its Nativity; accordingly having settled his Affairs at Nice, he set forward with his Empress, and Andronicus his Son, at that time but two Years of Age, and being arriv'd near the City, he march'd as in solemn Procession, and enter'd it on Foot by the Golden Gate, where he again return'd publick Thanks to God; which being ended, he diligently survey'd the Imperial City, and beheld in it the tyrannical Marks of a long and miserable Captivity. The Magnificent Palaces of his Predecessors, the stately Dwellings of the greatest among the Byzantine Emperors, lay now in Ruins, neglected and defac'd. Time had devour'd many of the capacious Buildings, and the Fire, and other unavoidable Accidents of War, had destroy'd more. These Objects allay'd in the Emperor peror the Sense of his present good Fortune, and kindled in him a Desire of re-edifying that City, which had been formerly the glorious Mistress of the East.

But neither this nor any other Thoughts could divert him from paying the Honour due to Virtue and Desert ; he look'd on Alexius as the Restorer and Redeemer of his Country ; wherefore having cloath'd him with Robes of Honour, and plac'd a Crown little inferior to that he wore himself, upon his Head, he order'd him in a solemn and pompous Triumph to be conducted through the City ; and made a Decree, that for the Year next ensuing Alexius's Name should be join'd with that of the Emperor in all Hymns, and Prayers of Thanksgiving. And that he might perpetuate the Memory of so great and glorious an Action, he commanded his Statue to be erected on a beautiful Marble Pillar before the great Church of the Holy Apostles, that Posterity might know what Alexius had done for the Delivery of his Country.

His next Care was to cleanse the City, and remove from it those Hills of Rubbish which choak'd up the Streets, and lay like Monuments of its Disgrace, and the Triumph of its Enemies ; and knowing that, tho' the chief of the Latins were gone with their Emperor, yet the greatest Part of the Merchants and Artificers remain'd behind, whose Industry might prove beneficial and advantageous to the State, he assign'd unto 'em the City of Galatia, now call'd Pera, together with several peculiar Privileges, which encourag'd 'em to be easie and chearful under his Government ; as for the Imperial City it self, he suffer'd very few to settle in it but what were natural Greeks.

*Which he repeoples
with Greek Inhabitants.*

Hitherto Palæologus's Reign had been attended with such a Success as might in some measure deserve the Title of Great, which was afterwards conferr'd upon him ; and as yet he had done nothing that could blacken his Reputation since his Advancement, but the

the Means by which he had attain'd unto it. But Jealousie is too often the inseparable Companion of Usurpation, as it now appear'd evidently in Palæologus; who tho' he had attain'd to a greater Degree of Happiness than ever he could reasonably have expected, tho' he was too powerful to fear any Competitor, and reign'd universally in the Hearts of his Subjects, yet was he continually awaken'd with Fears and Apprehensions, forming Dangers where none could arise, and dreading those Calamities, his guilty Conscience suggested to him he had deserv'd.

This Temper in Palæologus forc'd him upon such Measures as very much sully'd that Character which otherwise would have appear'd more beautiful and lovely. Theodorus Lascaris, the late Emperor, had four Daughters, the two Eldest of whom were married to Michael, Despot of Epire, and Constantine, King of Bulgaria; who having, in the Beginning of his Administration, appear'd disaffected to him, in his Opinion justify'd his Suspicions: Wherefore he thought it prudent so to dispose of the other two, as that they might administer no Cause of Distrust to him; accordingly he marry'd 'em to two Latins, Men of no Birth or Interest, and who consequently were unable to create him any Trouble. When this was done, the distrustful Usurper, forgetful of all former Obligations, and an utter Stranger to Nature and Humanity, the better to secure to himself and his Posterity the Sovereignty of the Empire, being unwilling or afraid to kill him, cruelly caus'd the young Prince's Eyes to be put out, whom he at first had honour'd as his Sovereign, and afterwards respected as his Colleague.

He puts out
the Eyes of the young
Emperor.

This bloody Fact, which Palæologus design'd for his Security, expos'd him to many Dangers and Calamities: For Theodora, Sister to the young Prince, and the King of Bulgaria's Wife, ceas'd not with her Sighs, her Tears and Prayers, to incite her Husband to Revenge; and he, being supported with above

twenty twenty thousand Tartars, who lay then upon the Ister, broke suddenly into the Emperor's Territories, and over-ran all Thrace with so great Violence, that the whole Country was in a manner destroy'd before Palæologus could be inform'd of their Preparations. He was at that time engag'd in a War against the Despot of Epirus in Thessaly, and had unavoidably been taken by the Bulgarians as he was returning home, had he not escap'd in a Vessel that accidentally put into water, and landed him safe at Constantinople; where tho' he publickly presum'd to return Thanks for his Deliverance, yet his late Barbarity had provok'd the Divine Vengeance, and in time involv'd him in such Difficulties as hardly any of his Predecessors had been expos'd to before him.

He look'd on the Prince of Epire, and King of Bulgaria, as his irreconcilable Enemies; he was no less afraid of Charles, King of Sicily, a Prince of great Power and Reputation, whose Son having marry'd the Daughter of Baldwin, late Emperor of the Latins in Constantinople, was continually sollicitated by that Prince for his Restoration: He knew how unable he was, without some Foreign Assistance, to oppose these Powers, should they unite against him; and having obtain'd the Empire by indirect unlawful Means, he was every Hour afraid of losing it.

And that nothing might be wanting to aggravate the Discontents of this Emperor, Arsenius, the Patriarch, was so worthily incens'd against him for his Treason and Barbarity, that he had the Courage to Excommunicate him, and all those who had been his Accomplices in his late Cruelty to the young Prince; and tho' Palæologus earnestly petition'd him for several Days together to have the Excommunication taken off, yet the Patriarch persisted with so much Courage, that the Emperor found himself oblig'd to call a Synod of Bishops, where Arsenius was summon'd to appear, to answer some pretended Crimes the Emperor had to alledge against him; and when the

For which
he is excommunicated
by the Patriarch.

the undaunted Prelate refus'd to answer the Summons, he was formally depos'd, and Germanus, Archbishop of Adrianople, was substituted in his Place; of which in a short time he grew so weary, that he voluntarily resign'd, and made way for the Advancement of another, who prov'd more Complaisant to the perplex'd Emperor.

Shortly after this the Venetians rigg'd out a powerful Fleet for the Recovery of those Islands in the Ægean Sea, which Palæologus had seiz'd immediately after the Reduction of Constantinople; whereupon a War commenc'd, and was continu'd between them and the Emperor for several Years together, during which the Venetians prevail'd so mightily against him, that had not the Genoese been persuaded to assist him, he had been oblig'd to quit the Imperial City, for which the Pope was so offended at the Genoese, that he proceeded to an Excommunication against 'em.

and plung'd
into innumerable Troubles.

These Difficulties, with which he saw himself surrounded on every side, made Palæologus have Recourse to a Remedy which in the End prov'd fatal to him and the Empire, which like an old diseas'd Body hasten'd now to a Dissolution. That he might the better divert those Troubles which threatn'd him from the West, where the Pope, the late Emperor Baldwin, the King of Sicily, and the Venetians, were combin'd against him, he sent his Ambassadors to Urban IV. then Pope of Rome, offering to submit himself and all his Dominions to the Latin Church, provided the Pope would undertake to shelter him from the Storm which seem'd ready to discharge it self upon him. Pursuant to which, in the Council of Lyons, which was celebrated in the Year 1276. either in Person, as some have written, or rather by his Ambassadors, he made a formal Submission, admitted the Latin Ceremonies into the Churches of Greece, and acknowledg'd the Supremacy of the Pope. But when he undertook to introduce and settle this Reformation in his Dominions, Joseph the Patriarch quitted his Post, and forsaking

A. D.
1276.
His Innovations in Religion cause a Persecution in the Greek Church.

taking the City retir'd into a Monastery near the Bosphorus, and the rest of the Clergy offended at these Innovations, openly inveigh'd against 'em in their Sermons, and put both the City and Country into such a Ferment, that Palæologus found he had rais'd such Troubles at home, as were equal or more dangerous than those of which he had been apprehensive from abroad ; which provok'd him to proceed with great Severity against those who appear'd the most obstinate, imprisoning some, banishing others, and torturing the rest ; whereupon the Refuse of the People ran in great Numbers into Peloponnesus, Thessaly, Achaia, and even as far as Colchos, and where-ever else their Fears drove, or their Humours led 'em ; where they disgrac'd that Religion for which they pretended they were persecuted, disagreeing among themselves, adhering some to Arsenius, some to Joseph, and others, who grew the Heads of Sects, deceiv'd themselves and deceiving their Followers.

This threw the Empire into a sort of Convulsion, and the Emperor was so encumber'd with his Domestic Troubles, that he had not leisure to provide for the Tempest arising out of the East, where he suffer'd the Turks to gain Ground daily upon him, whilst his whole Care was apply'd to the restraining his Subjects in their due Obedience at home.

And yet, notwithstanding he had in so solemn a manner united himself to the Church of Rome, and by the Troubles that ensu'd thereupon seem'd to deserve the Favour and Protection of that See, yet was he, a little before his Death, excommunicated by the Pope, for having contributed to the Massacre in Sicily, call'd the Sicilian Vespers ; to which he was induc'd by his ancient Hatred to Charles, King of that Island, and therefore join'd against him with Peter of Arragon, his Competitor ; Palæologus thinking all Means lawful that serv'd to disarm an Enemy, and preserve to himself that Authority, the maintaining of which had thrown him upon so many unwarrantable Courses.

A. D.

1281.

He is ex-communicated by the Pope.

At

and dies.

At length, broken by Age, and oppress'd with Cares, he finish'd his unhappy Life, and more unfortunate Reign, not far from Lisimachia, as he was arming against John, the Prince of Thessaly, who by his frequent Rebellions and sinister Practices had given him no small Trouble during his Reign. Having ask'd the Name of the Place he was at when first he was taken ill, and receiving for answer that it was call'd Pachomium, he with a deep Sigh declar'd God's Judgments were just against him, for that he had not long before put an innocent Man of that Name to Death, because he had been inform'd that one Pachomius was to be his Successor.

His Character.

Tho' this Prince was nobly born, tho' he was of a Majestick Presence, an obliging Temper, and a great Encourager of Learning; tho' he was Master of all the Qualities requisite in a compleat Soldier, and finish'd Statesman, yet was he but in one thing truly happy during the whole Course of his Reign, which was the Recovery of Constantinople: In other Matters he was as unhappy as most of his Predecessors, if we consider either his private Troubles or the Calamities he brought upon the Empire; the Divine Vengeance seeming to pursue him with an inflexible Severity, for his execrable Treason and Barbarity. His uncommon Magnificence and Liberality gain'd him at first the Love and Esteem of all his Subjects, but his shameful Submission to the See of Rome, and the Persecution that afterwards ensu'd thereupon, render'd him so detested by 'em, that Andronicus, his Son and Successor, thought he could not in the Beginning of his Reign recommend himself by a more popular Act to his Subjects, than by denying his Father not only those Funeral Honours due to deceas'd Princes, but even the Rites of Christian Burial. It may be said of this Emperor, that as hardly any of his Predecessors involv'd themselves in greater Troubles, so none of them supported 'em with a greater Courage and Presence of Mind, even then enlarging the Borders of his Dominions

Dominions when he was labouring under almost insuperable Difficulties. Palæologus dy'd in the twenty fourth Year of his Reign and fifty eighth of his Age, the thirteenth of Philip surnam'd the Bold, King of France, and the eleventh of Edward I. King of England, An. Dom. 1283.

Michael Palæologus being dead, his eldest Son, Andronicus, succeeded him in the Empire, which he held longer and govern'd more unfortunately than his Father, laying a Foundation in the Beginning of his Reign for those innumerable Calamities which befel him afterwards. His Father left two Sons more behind him, the Elder of which was call'd Constantine, and the Youngest Theodorus; Constantine was furnish'd with all those Gifts of Nature which beautify a deserving Prince, and by his courteous obliging Behaviour had render'd himself the Darling of the People. This made him better belov'd than his Brother by the late Emperor, who once thought of preferring him to the Succession; and when the Consideration of Birth-right had prevail'd with him to the contrary, he then propos'd to dismember great Part of Thessaly and Macedonia from the Empire, and declare him Prince of it with an absolute independent Authority. This 'tis thought he would effectually have done, had not Death prevented him; however he assign'd him such large Revenues as answer'd the Greatness of his Mind, and enabled him with an unlimited Bounty to oblige his Favourites, Followers and Dependants; all which concurr'd to render him at first ungracious, and afterwards suspected to his Brother. This ill Disposition in the Emperor towards him being observ'd by his flattering Courtiers, they endeavour'd to improve it, by representing to him the Dangers he ought to apprehend from a Person so popular, whose great Bounty was a manifest Argument of his ambitious Designs. Constantine was then in Asia, where he had in many Battels overthrow the Turks, and courageously defended the Frontiers of the Empire. This also was alledg'd alledg'd against him by his Enemies at Court, who by their perverse Insinuations misapply'd his Virtues to his Ruin, and by degrees represented him so dangerous to the Emperor, that Andronicus thought it consistent with his Safety to pass over in Person into Asia, and oppress him before he could be provided for his own Security. This was effected according as the Emperor had design'd it, for the unhappy Prince was suddenly seiz'd, and thrown into Prison, with all his chief Favourites, among whom was Michael Strategopulus, the Son of that famous Alexius who recover'd Constantinople from the Latins in the last Reign, and was for that Reason deservedly esteem'd by the late Emperor, a Man inferior to none throughout the Empire for Wealth, Honour and noble Exploits.

A. D.

1283.

Andronicus II.

The Misfortune of these brave Men prov'd that of the Empire, for now the Soldiers, having none left to command 'em, neglected their Duty, and left the Frontiers as a Prey to the Turks, against whom the Emperor sent Alexius Philanthropenus and Libadarius, who were to supply the Place of his Brother and Strategopulus. Philanthropenus was then in the Flower of his Youth, and had been a fortunate Captain, but he was vain and ambitious; Libadarius was an old experienc'd Soldier, but jealous of his Honour, designing and revengeful. Tho' they were both Men of Parts, and fit for the Trust the Emperor had repos'd in 'em, yet an unhappy Misunderstanding that arose between 'em prov'd fatal to the Empire. Libadarius had the Government of the Cities of Ionia committed to him, and the other the Charge of the Frontiers upon the Banks of the Mæander, where his frequent and successful Engagements with the Turks highly improved the Reputation he had before acquir'd in Arms, which serv'd only to make him more bountiful and courteous to all those who had Occasion to apply to him. This made him popular, and inspir'd him with pernicious Thoughts, which in the Issue proved his Destruction. He had a good Number of Candiot Soldiers

Soldiers that serv'd in his Army, who knowing the aspiring Temper of their General, and hoping to raise their Fortunes by his Advancement, suggested strange Matters to him, and representing to him the jealous Fears of the Emperor, which had been the Destruction of his own Brother and Strategopulus, and the private Practices of Libadarius against him, persuaded him that it indispensably consisted with his Safety to assume the Imperial Purple; which, after several Conflicts with himself, he was prevail'd upon to do. Philanthropenus
usurps,

Libadarius, who had a vigilant Eye over him, acquainted the Emperor with his Proceedings, who immediately commanded him to use all possible Means to suppress him, declaring him a Traitor, and setting a Price upon his Head. Had Alexius mov'd directly against Libadarius, he had in all probability been too strong for him; but he imprudently directed his Arms against Theodorus, the Emperor's Brother, who being instructed by his Brother Constantine's Misfortunes, liv'd a private but pleasant Life in Lydia, far from the Ambition of the Court, and so unable to have created the Usurper any Diversion. In the mean time Libadarius, being supply'd with a considerable Sum of Money which he rais'd in those Parts, recruited his Army, which in time grew more powerful than that of Alexius; and when all things were ripe for an Engagement between 'em, he so far prevail'd with the mercenary Candiots, to whom he made bountiful Presents, and large Promises of future Preferments, that just as the Battel was joining they deliver'd Alexius and is sup-press'd bound to Libadarius, who put out his Eyes, and kept him in Prison, 'till the Emperor's farther Pleasure was known.

Tho' this prov'd of a most unhappy Consequence to the Empire, as will appear hereafter, yet were other Actions of this Emperor in the Beginning of his Reign no less prejudicial to it. He thought to allay the Troubles of the Church by revoking whatever his Father had done, and reducing all to the ancient Forms; but they who had before conform'd to the late Emperor's Pleasure, and receiv'd the Latin Customs, still defended the same with great Obstinacy against the contrary Faction, who being now countenanc'd by the Emperor, arrogantly insulted those whom they accounted fond of Innovations. This reviv'd the Schism in the Church, and created great Animosities in the State, whilst the Turks in the mean time prevail'd on every side, and not only extended their Territories in Asia, but conquer'd several of the Islands in the Mediterranean. For Andronicus, by an unseasonable Piece of good Husbandry, had discharg'd all his Seamen, who now receiv'd Pay from his Enemies, and laid up his Ships; being persuaded by his flattering Courtiers, that the Maintenance of his Fleet created a needless Expence, and that the Money might be apply'd to other Uses of more Benefit to the Publick: By which means the Turks grew absolute Masters at Sea, and the Pirates infested the Coasts, to the utter Ruin of Trade and Commerce: So that every thing concurr'd to hasten the Destruction of the Empire, which began now to be unavoidable.

Ronzerisu, a Spaniard,

The Turks prevailing every Day more and more in Asia, the Emperor found it necessary to maintain a strong Army against 'em, but since the Rebellion of Philanthropenus he grew so jealous of his own Subjects, that he repos'd a greater Trust in Strangers, whom he encourag'd and entertain'd in his Service, to the great Detriment of the State. Among these was Ronzerius, Captain of a strong Body of Spaniards, who having serv'd formerly in the Wars between the Kings of Sicily and Naples, offer'd now his Mercenary Troops to the Emperor, who gladly receiv'd him, and gave him his Niece in Marriage, and shortly after honour'd him with the Title of Cæsar, sending him to the Relief of Philadelphia, at that time closely besieg'd by the Turks. This Service he perform'd with great Success, for besides his own Spaniards, he had the best of the Greek Soldiers

Soldiers under his Command, and no less than ten thousand Massagetes, who having been driven from home by their Neighbours, the European Tartars, were suffer'd to pass the Ister with their Wives and Children, and receiv'd the Emperor's Pay.

When Ronzerius had perform'd this considerable Service, and the Greeks and Massagetes were return'd home, he rov'd up and down the Emperor's Territories in Asia, which he wast'd at his Pleasure, and directed his Forces against those he had been sent to relieve; alledging that he was oblig'd to let his Troops live at Discretion, 'till they had receiv'd the great Arrears due to 'em from the Emperor: Upon this Pretence the poor People were barbarously treated every where, the Men were tortur'd 'till they discover'd their hid Treasure, their Wives and Daughters ravish'd, and all was subject to the Rage and Lust of those dissolute Vagabonds; at which the Emperor was highly incens'd, and beheld his Subjects Calamities with an ineffectual Pity, for his Coffers being empty, he was unable to redress 'em.

When Ronzerius had thus pillag'd the Territories in Asia, and scatter'd Desolation all around him, he return'd with all his Forces into Europe, and quartering the rest of his Army at Callipolis, he march'd with two hundred of his Men to Michael, the Emperor's eldest Son, whom he had lately associated with him in the Empire, lying then at Orestias in Thrace, to demand his Pay, or rather extort it from him with Threats. Michael had been justly provok'd at his Behaviour in Asia, and was now so incens'd at his insolent Carriage, that his Guards slew him, and most of his Followers, the rest flying with the News of what had been done to their Fellows at Callipolis, who were so enrag'd at the Death of their General, that they first slew all the Citizens, and then fortify'd the City, breathing nothing but Blood and Defiance.

slain by the young Emperor's Orders.

The Mischiefs that ensu'd hereupon are incredible, for part of 'em manning out eight Gallies robbed all

The Turks
first call'd
into Europe.

the Merchant-Ships in the Streights, and had reduc'd Constantinople it self to the last Extremity, if they had not been encounter'd and destroy'd by a Fleet of Genoese. In the mean time those who had been left behind in the City, finding themselves hard press'd, and expecting every Moment to be assaulted by the young Emperor Michael, resolv'd upon a Thing the most fatal that could happen to the Empire, for they call'd the Turks into their Assistance, and, together with them, destroyed all the adjacent Country, bringing in whole Herds of Cattle at a time, together with their Keepers.

This was the first time the Turks were call'd into Europe, and gave a Beginning to those endless Miseries with which Christendom has been afflicted ever since, and is one of the most fatally memorable Events that happen'd during this Emperor's Reign.

The Emperor defeated.

These Miscreants grew at length so confident as to venture a pitch'd Battel with the young Emperor Michael, which, after he had perform'd in Person all that could be expected from an experienc'd Captain and valiant Soldier, having his Horse slain under him, he lost, and was entirely routed: For the Masagetes, and some other Auxiliaries that were in his Army, upon the first Charge retir'd and stood at a Distance, as idle Spectators. Michael himself escap'd with much Difficulty to Dydimothicum, where the Emperor then lay, who receiv'd him very graciously, but check'd him for exposing himself, and adventuring his Person so far.

The Spaniards, after this Victory, with their continual Inroads infested not only the Sea-Coasts, but the Inland Country of Thrace, laying all waste before 'em. When they had, like Locusts, devour'd the Fat of the Land, and found it impossible for 'em to subsist any longer in those Parts, perceiving the Emperor had shut 'em out of Macedonia, where they had lately winter'd, and whither they prepar'd to return, they pass'd pass'd the prodigious Mountains of Olympus, Pelion and Ossa, and pierc'd into the Plains of Thessaly, and at length, after long Marches and bloody Conflicts, they seated themselves in Attica, having brought innumerable Calamities upon the Empire, and first taught the Turks the Way into Europe.

At the same time that the Spaniards prepar'd to invade Thessaly, those Turks separated from 'em, and being then about one thousand three hundred Foot, and eight hundred Horse, they offer'd the Emperor to depart quietly home, provided they might be transported with all their Substance into Asia; to which Andronicus, who reflected on the great Mischiefs they had already done his Provinces, and willing to be eas'd of so troublesome a Burden, readily condescended, and gave Orders for their Transportation accordingly. But the Imperial Officers and Soldiers, observing the great Spoil they had gather'd in the Emperor's Provinces, and were now going to transport into Asia, to the eternal Infamy, as they thought, of the Roman Name, they undertook a thing neither honourable in it self, Andronicus having given his Word to the contrary, nor easily to be effected; for, allur'd with the Hopes of so rich a Booty, they neither made the necessary Provisions for 'em in their March, nor provided 'em with Ships when they came to the Hellespont, but prepar'd to fall suddenly upon 'em, and destroy 'em. The Matter was not manag'd with so much Secrecy, but the Turks had timely Intimation of it, wherefore seizing on a strong Castle that stood in those Parts, they prepar'd vigorously to make it good against those, who had contriv'd their Destruction, and sent immediately over for Assistance from their Countrymen in Asia, which was accordingly sent 'em. When this was done they wasted the Country all about by their frequent Excursions, and grew too powerful for the Officers that commanded in that Country.

*The Turks
destroy the Emperor's Provinces.*

When the young Emperor Michael was inform'd of these Proceedings he rais'd a strong Army, which encreas'd by Multitudes of Country People, who flock'd to him with their Spades, Mattocks, and other Rustick Instruments, with which he closely besieg'd 'em. The Turks were at first so terrify'd at his Approach, that they look'd on their Destruction as inevitable; but when they beheld the Disorders of the Greeks, who observ'd no Discipline, but in Confidence of their own Strength had already divided the Spoils of their Enemies, then, having secur'd their Wealth and Women, with whatever else they judg'd unnecessary in the Fight, they sally'd out with no more than eight hundred chosen Horse, and so astonish'd the unwary Greeks, especially the rude undisciplin'd Boors, that they fled in great Disorder, and were follow'd by the rest of the Army, who left the Emperor's Treasure, the Imperial Ensigns, and all their Baggage behind 'em.

This Defeat reduc'd the Emperor to the last Extremity; for the insolent Turks laid all Thrace waste, and grew so powerful in that Country, that the Inhabitants for two Years together were confin'd within their wall'd Towns, not daring to stir out to Till their Ground, and so labour'd under all the Calamities that Divine Justice often inflicts upon a guilty Nation. The Emperor in the mean time found himself unable to protect 'em, and tho' he earnestly solicited Crales Prince of Servia, his Son-in-Law, to assist him, yet that Prince express'd so great an Indifference in the Cause, that their Miseries grew inexpressible. At length Philes Palæologus, a Man nearly related to the Emperor, highly provok'd at the insolent Barbarities of the Turks, desir'd he might have leave to chastise 'em. This Man seem'd chosen by God himself for that purpose; he had from his Youth been bred up at Court, and was consequently a Stranger to the Arts of War, and was moreover of a weak Constitution, sickly, and infirm: On the other hand, he was exem-

exemplarily remarkable for his upright Dealing, and Integrity of Life; and was withal so devout, that he often spent the greatest part of the Day in his Prayers at Church. With these Qualifications Philes undertook the Defence of his Country, and having rais'd a small Army he took care in the first Place to establish a good Discipline among his Soldiers, whom he earnestly exhorted to Temperance and Sobriety; he allur'd 'em by frequent Donatives, encourag'd 'em by pathetick Speeches, and us'd all means necessary to prepare 'em for the Service to which they were design'd. When he thought he had modell'd 'em according to his own Desires, he march'd at the Head of this chearful Army against the Turks, and encamp'd on a large Plain near a little River call'd Xerogipsum, being inform'd that a great Body of the Enemy were to return that way from Foraging. He had not lain here two Days before he receiv'd Advice that the Enemies, laden with Spoil, were approaching, and that, having dispos'd of their Captives and the rich Booty they had taken among their Carriages, they were preparing for an Engagement. Philes, having marshall'd his Men, gave the Word, and the Fight began with great Fury on both sides, the Turks fighting for the Preservation of what they had been purchasing, and the Christians engaging not only for the Recovery of what they had lost, but for their Religion, their Liberties, and future Security. The Christians at first had the Advantage, 'till he who commanded the Right Wing of the Army had his Horse kill'd under him, which forc'd him to retire out of the Battel, to the great Amazement of the Christians, who thereupon began to give Ground to the Turks that press'd with redoubled Fury upon 'em. Philes in the mean time urg'd his Men to renew the Charge, and with earnest Prayers invok'd the Divine Assistance; as did the Captives, who were divided between Hope and Fear, and lay expecting the Event of the Battel. At length Philes, follow'd by the most resolute of his

and are overthrown
by Philes
Palæologus.

Men, wheel'd about, and in a manner surrounded the Barbarian Horse, whilst the Foot broke in upon the main Body, and put 'em to a shameful Rout. The Christians pursu'd their fugitive Enemies to the Entrance of the Chersonese, where Philes encamp'd, and with five Gallies sent him by the Emperor, and eight which the Genoese of Pera brought to his Assistance, kept the Streights so securely guarded, that 'twas impossible for the Turks to receive any Assistance out of Asia. About the same time Philes his Army was strengthen'd with two thousand Horse out of Servia, by which means the Turks were shut up both by Sea and Land, having nothing to recur to but their usual Valour, and were so weaken'd by frequent Actions, that they began utterly to despair. Wherefore casting away their Arms in the dead of Night, and taking with them all their Gold and Silver, which they had in great Plenty among 'em, they made down towards the Sea side, with a Design of yielding themselves up to the Genoese, from whom they expected more Mercy than from the Imperialists, because they had never been provok'd by 'em. Notwithstanding their Precaution, many of 'em, in the Confusion of the Night, fell unawares among the Greeks, who slew 'em all without any Compassion. The Genoese kill'd such as brought the Money with them, lest if they were suffer'd to live, they might in time discover it to the Greeks; the rest they bound in Chains, sending some to the Emperor, and reserving those remaining as Slaves for themselves. By this means Europe was for the present deliver'd from the Turks, to Philes his great Commendation, and no less Joy of the Emperor.

A. D.
1321.

After this the Court enjoy'd a short Repose, and the Subjects of the Empire began again to taste the Delights of Peace; but Andronicus, who had been so long exercis'd in Foreign Troubles, became involv'd about this time in Domestick Embroilments, which pursu'd him to his Grave. Michael, his eldest Son, who was his Companion in the Empire, had two Sons,

Andro-

Andronicus and Manuel, and as many Daughters, the eldest of which was marry'd to the Prince of Epire, and her Sister to the Prince of Bulgaria. The Prince Andronicus, tho' exceedingly belov'd by the old Emperor, was a Youth dissolute and intractable, provoking both his Father and Grand-father by a thousand Extravagances to reprove him almost every Day. Among other Frolicks, he frequently visited in the Silence of the Night, a Lady, the Infamy of whose Life highly disgrac'd the Dignity of her Birth, and who being likewise admir'd by another Gallant, the Prince imagining him to be the greater Favourite had resolv'd to remove him, and therefore appointed some Ruffians to watch him as he was going to visit his Mistress, and to dispatch him. It happen'd that Manuel, Andronicus's Brother, went that way that very Night, with little or no Attendance, in quest of him, and was mistaken in the Dark by those Murderers, who gave him two or three mortal Wounds, of which he dy'd in a few Days after. This bloody Outrage exceedingly afflicted the old Emperor, who foresaw, from the present Temper of the Prince, what was like to follow; and when the Report of it was brought to his Father, who lay then at Thessalonica, he dy'd of Grief.

Andronicus the younger his dissolute Practices.

The Sorrow the Emperor conceiv'd at these heavy Misfortunes were much improv'd by the Behaviour of the young Prince, who grew every Day more extravagant and dangerous; associating himself with Men of factious unruly Spirits, who sought nothing more than to improve the Distempers of the State. Among these was Syrgiannes, a Man politick and powerful, who having been formerly imprison'd by the Emperor for some ambitious Designs, tho' he was now reconcil'd and entrusted by him, yet he preserv'd in his Memory the Sense of his Disgrace, and retain'd a deep Resentment of it. With him was join'd John Cantacuzenus, Theodorus Synadenus, and Alexius Apocau-cus; the two first, Men of great Honour and Credit with

He is drawn into a Rebellion against his Grand-father.

with the Emperor, to whom they had long profess'd an inviolable Friendship; the other inferior to the rest in Quality, but equal to 'em in a largeness of Understanding, and a consummate Experience in Affairs of State. These Men found the young Prince a Subject proper for their Designs, whom they inspir'd with a Thirst of Power, and by frequent Remonstrances endeavour'd to render him disaffected to his Grand-father. They prevail'd by their Arts so effectually upon him, that at length they drew him into an avow'd Rebellion against the aged Emperor. Cantacuzenus, in the History he has left us, endeavours to justify this Proceeding in the young Prince; but he is to be read with Caution, for he is allow'd on all Hands to be notoriously partial. If the Emperor design'd to deprive him of the Succession, 'twas no more than his licentious Youth had deserv'd; and no Provocation whatever could justify his taking up Arms against his Sovereign. Cantacuzenus and Syrigianes had procur'd to themselves the Government of such Towns and Provinces as they judg'd would be most conducive to their Designs, where they muster'd Soldiers, provided Armour, entertain'd Strangers, and appointed those Men to the Government of the Cities, who they knew would be most faithful to 'em. All this was colour'd with the popular Pretence of providing for the Security of their Country against the Irruptions of the Tartars, and the Designs of the Turks, for which their generous Care they were highly applauded even by the unwary Emperor himself; who having heap'd many Obligations upon 'em, thought they could not be such Villains as to betray him. In the mean time the young Prince was privately inform'd of all their Proceedings, and advis'd what Measures he was to take, that he might underhand act in Conjunction with them.

His Faction in the City improv'd every Day, and there was some Hot-spurs among 'em, that made him entertain Thoughts against the very Life of his Grand-father;

father; who perceiving that he was become irreclaimable, resolv'd, as the last Remedy, to reprove him openly before the Patriarch and the chief of the Nobility and Clergy; and if he found he persisted still in his Contumacy, then to have him committed to Prison, and by that means prevent any dangerous Attempts for the future.

Of this the young Prince receiv'd private Information, and therefore when he was sent for to the Palace, he went attended with a great Number of his Followers and Favourites, who were for the most part privately arm'd, between whom it was agreed, that if the Emperor appear'd too severe in his Reproofs, or offer'd any Violence to his Grandson, that then upon a Signal given they should rush in with their Swords drawn, and having kill'd the Emperor, place the young Prince in the Imperial Seat. When the Patriarch, the Nobility and Clergy were met, and the young Andronicus appear'd according to his Summons, the aged Emperor mix'd so much of the Father with his grave Reprehensions, and reprov'd him in so tender affectionate a manner, that he drew Tears from all that were present, and wrought so powerfully upon the Prince himself, that he appear'd ashamed of his Follies, fell at his Grandfather's Feet, who rais'd him with a Kiss, and promis'd an entire Submission for the future. After which, the Prince having engag'd to attempt nothing hereafter against the Emperor, and the Emperor promis'd that he would appoint no other to succeed him in the Empire, they both parted with all the visible Demonstrations of a sincere Reconciliation. But when the Prince came out to his Accomplices, who plainly foresaw that an Union betwixt him and his Grandfather would be their Ruin, they exclaim'd against him in most bitter Terms, as one who had betray'd his faithful Friends, and expos'd 'em to the Fury of an incens'd Prince, who was become their Enemy for no other Reason but their Love and Fidelity to him.

*Heflies into
Thrace.*

him. Hereupon the Prince, who, among other Matters, had promis'd the Emperor to discover the Names of his evil Counsellors, sent for Theodorus Metochita, the Emperor's chief Minister, and instead of performing what he had undertaken, urg'd him to do the same good Offices with the Emperor for them, as he had done before for him; which when that Minister refus'd, but adjur'd him to withdraw himself from the Society of those Men, who having broken their Faith given before to the Emperor, would likewise in time betray him, he thrust him from him with Indignation, and falling in a Moment from his former Resolution, he again suffer'd the old Companions of his Follies to resort to him, and entertain'd the same pernicious Thoughts he had done before: Of which when the Emperor was inform'd, he at length resolv'd to suppress him before he grew too powerful, communicating his Resolutions to none but Gerasimus the Patriarch, who instantly inform'd the Prince of it, and he fled with his Accomplices, the Night before he was to have been apprehended, and escap'd to Adrianople. Cantacuzenus takes no notice of this Treason in the Patriarch, but assigns some other Circumstances, which induc'd the young Prince to fly, whom he takes Care on all Occasions to vindicate and excuse.

It was a fatal Oversight in the Emperor, that he not only suffer'd, but forc'd those Great Men who were of the Prince's Party out of the City, upon Pretence of sending them to their Governments abroad; whereas had he secur'd 'em, as he had just Reason so to do, the young Andronicus would not have met with that Assistance he afterwards found from Syrgiannes, Cantacuzenus, and the rest, who lay with a strong Body of Forces at Adrianople ready to receive him.

The old Emperor, being advertis'd of the Prince's Flight, commanded him immediately to be proclaim'd Traitor, proscrib'd him and all his Adherents, and requir'd quir'd a new Oath of Allegiance from the Inhabitants of Constantinople: Whilst, on the other side, the Prince, finding himself at the Head of a powerful Army, so effectually manag'd the leading Men in Thrace, that the whole Country in a short time revolted to him; by which means his Forces receiv'd so considerable an Increase, that in a few Days he was able to detach a sufficient Number of Horse and Foot, under the Conduct of Syrgiannes, who were to attempt Constantinople before the Emperor had recover'd himself, and whilst the Citizens lay under a general Consternation. Syrgiannes march'd with so much Expedition, and the Emperor found himself so unable to oppose him, that he was perswaded to endeavour at an Accommodation, and therefore sent Theoleptus, Bishop of Philadelphia, a Man of extraordinary Reputation for Wisdom and Sanctity to the young Prince, together with Irene his Mother, who like another Volumnia, was to deprecate her Son's Indignation, and avert the Storm with which he threaten'd his Country. Syrgiannes receiv'd both the Bishop and his Mother with a Respect that was due to the one and the other, and waited on 'em to the young Prince lying at Orestias; where, after several Disputes on both sides, it was at length agreed, " That the Empire should be divided, " that the Prince should have all Thrace from Chrisopolis to Rhegium, and the Suburbs of Constantinople for his Share; that his Followers should enjoy without Molestation, such Lands as he had conferr'd upon 'em in Macedonia: And that, on the other hand, " the Emperor should retain all the rest of the Imperial Dominions, having the Honour of receiving " Ambassadors, and treating with Foreign Princes. Cantacuzenus saith that this Treaty met with many Difficulties, that all the young Prince's Friends dissuaded him from any Agreement with the Emperor, and that the Army was hardly restrain'd from assaulting Constantinople. Certain it is the young Prince's Interest was very great, not only in the Army where he was absolute,

Greg.
which re-
volts to him

An Agreement between the Emperor
and the Prince.

absolute, but even in the Imperial City it self, where several Persons of a factious uneasie Spirit were desirous of a Revolution. Thus was the Roman Empire, as our Authors still had the Vanity to call it, divided between the two Princes, tho' at that time it contain'd no more in Europe, than Thrace, Macedon, Thessaly, Attica, Bæotia, Acarmania, with the Islands in Peloponnesus, Lemnos, Chios, Lesbos, and some others. As for the Territories in Asia, they were for the most part during these Divisions swallow'd up by the Turks, who in the Year 1327, took from the Romans the City of Prusa in Bithynia, under the Conduct of Ottoman, who about that time took upon himself the Title of Sultan, or King, from which 'till then he had abstain'd, and laid the Foundation of that stupendous Greatness to which his Successors afterwards attain'd.

brought to nothing.

This Agreement between the two Princes was of no long Continuance, for Syrgiannes observing that, notwithstanding his many Services, and extraordinary Zeal for the young Prince, he had not that Interest in him he expected, but that he was entirely govern'd by Cantacuzenus, who rul'd with almost an absolute Authority, he began to consider how he might be reveng'd on the ungrateful Prince, by whom he thought himself so ill rewarded for all his former Services. Wherefore having first by Letters full of Submission prepar'd for his Reception at Constantinople, he fled thither, and reconcil'd himself to the Emperor. This renew'd the War on both sides, and brought fresh Troubles upon the Empire; for the Emperor sent his Son Constantine by Sea to Thessalonica, where he took upon him the Government of Macedon, from whence he was order'd to invade the Prince on one side, while Syrgiannes at the Head of some Turks, who had enter'd themselves into the Emperor's Pay, assaulted him on the other. The Prince, seeing himself in a manner inclos'd, sent Synadenus to defend the Frontiers of his Empire towards Constantinople, undertaking in Person to encounter or circumvent his his Uncle, Constantine in his Passage had seiz'd on Xene the Prince's Mother, whom he sent Prisoner to Constantinople; at which the Prince was highly exasperated against him, and set a Price upon his Head, promising a great Reward to those who should bring him, alive or dead, into his Presence. At the same time he order'd a Report industriously to be spread abroad of his Grand-father's Death, and some there were who had the Confidence to relate that he was slain in a Tumult at Constantinople, of which they were Eye-witnesses. This Report, and the Proscriptions that were out against him, so alarm'd Constantine, that he broke up, and retir'd in great Consternation to Thessalonica, where he receiv'd Letters from the Emperor, with Orders to apprehend five and twenty of the chief Citizens, and send 'em Prisoners to Constantinople. Tho' these Letters were deliver'd with great Secrecy, yet the Persons concern'd receiv'd timely Intimation of the Danger they were in, and stirr'd up the Inhabitants to their Assistance; whereupon the whole City was in an Uproar, and the Mob seizing on Constantine carry'd him Prisoner to the young Prince his Nephew, who with much Difficulty preserv'd him from the Violence of his Soldiers, and sav'd his Life, tho' he shortly after committed him to a Prison more insupportable than Death it self.

Shortly after this the Turks, who serv'd under Syrgiannes, being either terrify'd at the young Prince's Success, and the Reputation he had in those Parts, or privately prevail'd upon by him so to do, quitted the Service and retir'd home, at the same time that the Isle of Lemnos revolted to him; with which, and his Son's Misfortunes, the Emperor was so touch'd, that he desir'd nothing more than Peace. Wherefore having releas'd Xene, he sent her to the young Prince her Son at Rhegium, with Proposals for an Accommodation; and that Princess acquitted her self so happily of her Commission, that the Peace was in a few Days restor'd, and her Son went to meet his Grand-father renew'd.*

*A Peace

father before the Gates of the City, where there were many high Expressions of Duty and Respect on the one side, and of Tenderneſs and Affection on the other. After which the Prince went frequently into the City to viſit his Grand-father, and an entire Confidence ſeem'd to be eſtabliſh'd between 'em.

Gregor.

The young Prince
takes up Arms
again.

How ſincere the young Prince was in this Pacification he made appear by his future Practices, which Cantacuzenus endeavours to juſtifie by the Provocations he affirms he receiv'd from his Grandfather. However it were, tho' the old Emperor had granted him what he demanded, tho' he had ſuffer'd him to be crown'd with himſelf in the Temple of St. Sophia, and allow'd Ann of Savoy, whom he had lately marry'd upon the Death of his firſt Wife Irene, to be crown'd likewiſe ſhortly after, yet the ambitious Prince, impatient of a Rival, reſolv'd at length to remove his aged Grandfather, that he might reign without a Partner. In order to which he enter'd into a Treaty with Michael Prince of Bulgaria, his Brother-in-Law, who was to make a Diverſion in Servia, if that Prince ſhould move to the Emperor's Aſſiſtance; in Conſideration of which the young Andronicus was to pay him a conſiderable Sum of Money, and deliver up to him ſeveral Cities bordering upon his Territories, ſo ſoon as he had recover'd the Empire.

When this was done, the Prince ſeiz'd on the Publick Revenue in Thrace, and being encourag'd by frequent Meſſages from ſome of the principal Inhabitants of Conſtantinople, he march'd towards it, pretending it was to ſee his Ambaſſadors, that he was ſending to the Sultan of Egypt, embark with a Retinue ſuitable to their Character, at that Place. In the mean time the old Emperor receiv'd an Information of all Proceedings and Deſigns, from one who, in Detestation of ſo foul a Treason, had deſerted the young Prince, and fled over to the Grand-father. He thereupon ſent Meſſengers to him, forbidding him to enter the City, accusing him of manifeſt Treasons, and his Breach of the

the late Peace so solemnly sworn to, and confirm'd on both sides. After this he sent and desir'd the Assistance of Crales, Prince of Servia, and gave Orders to his Lieutenants in Macedonia, as soon as they had receiv'd the Supplies to be sent 'em by that Prince, to march against the young Emperor; who, on the other side, issu'd out his Edicts in all Parts of the Empire, even in Constantinople it self, wherein he proclaim'd a general Release of all Taxes and Impositions, and promis'd an Augmentation of the Soldiers Pay, by which means he exceedingly strengthen'd his Party; and arriving at Rhégium, requested by his Ambassadors from the old Emperor, either that he might have Leave to come into the City, according to the League that was between 'em, or that he would send out to him some of the Inhabitants of the greatest Reputation for their Wisdom and Authority, to whom he might freely deliver what he had to offer, both to his Grand-father and the People; at the same time he desir'd the Emperor not to give Credit to those Court-Sycophants, who incens'd him with their malicious Lies and Informations against him. The Emperor was exceedingly perplex'd at this Demand; he knew his Presence in the City, where the People were so generally well inclin'd to him, would endanger a Revolt; and if any were suffer'd to go out to him, he was afraid they in the end would create a Tumult and Sedition, for he was sensible his Grandson would do all he could first to gain them, and by them the rest of the Citizens. However, after some Deliberation, he thought the latter Proposal had the least of Danger in it, so that four and twenty of the principal Inhabitants, to whom some others were join'd afterwards, were dismiss'd to Rhégium, to hear what the young Emperor had to say in his own Vindication, and alledge against his Grand-father. These Men were very graciously receiv'd by Andronicus, who having first allow'd 'em some time to repose themselves, told 'em in a publick Assembly summon'd for that purpose, That had not his Grand-father ther been prepossess'd to his Prejudice, there would never have been that Difference there was as that Day between 'em, nor should he have had so just an Occasion of Complaint against him. Then he proceeded to recount how carefully he had observ'd the Agreement that had been made between 'em, and, on the contrary, in how many things his Grand-father had infring'd it; in Confirmation of which he produced several Letters written by the old Emperor to Cræles Prince of Servia, and others, which he had intercepted, and now urg'd as convincing Arguments against him. His whole Speech was manag'd with so much Art, that they who were sent in the Emperor's Name to accuse and reprove him, absolv'd him in their own private Opinions, and recommended to him the Care of the Publick. After this he discours'd with 'em separately in private, and omitted nothing whereby he might gain 'em to be his Advocates, not only with the Emperor, but, what he more earnestly desir'd, with the People. Accordingly at their Return they highly commended his generous Behaviour, his Inclinations to Peace, and his Readiness to comply in any thing reasonable with the Emperor.

The Behaviour of the People hereupon convinc'd the Emperor how just he had been in his Conjectures; for they could not now be restrain'd from declaring openly their Inclinations to him, and railing at the present Ministry, hardly sparing the unhappy Emperor himself; who dreading the tragical Effects of a popular Fury, summon'd the Patriarch and the rest of the Clergy, to consult with 'em what was to be done in that Exigency. When they were assembled he told 'em, he was ready to quit the Empire, if he could be persuaded it might be done with his own Safety, and the Good of the Publick; but that he had great Reason to distrust both the good Nature and Capacity of the young Emperor, whom he had tenderly lov'd from his Youth, had endeavour'd to endear him by innumerable Favours and Royal Concessions, and yet, notwithstanding all, he persisted in his Obstinacy and Rebellion: Wherefore he desir'd 'em, in Detestation of his Wickedness,

Wickedness, to endeavour to reclaim him by their Ecclesiastical Censures, to pronounce him unworthy of the Empire, and exclude him from the Communion of the Faithful. To this most of the Bishops present consented, and agreed that he should be no more nam'd in the Prayers of the Church, 'till he had learn'd to conform himself more submissively to the Pleasure of the Emperor. The Patriarch and some others, who secretly favour'd the young Prince, seemingly consented, but after several private Meetings among themselves, the Patriarch, summoning the People together by the Sound of the Bells, pronounc'd the Sentence of Excommunication against all such as presum'd to omit the Name of the young Emperor in their publick Prayers, or rob'd him of the Honours due to the Imperial Dignity: For which unwarrantable Act, and rebellious Proceedings in the Patriarch, he was, by the Emperor's Order, confin'd to the Monastery of Mangana.

When the young Emperor, lying at Rhegium, was inform'd of what had pass'd by Letters from his Friends in the City, he march'd towards it at the Head of thirteen hundred choice Men, and being come within sight of the Walls commanded his Army to halt; whilst he, attended by Cantacuzenus, and about thirty Soldiers, rode up to one of the Gates to be admitted, and desir'd to have a Conference with his Grand-father. They who stood as a Guard upon the Walls return'd him no other Answer, but that it was the Emperor's Pleasure he should depart, as abhorring all Conversation with a Rebel and Traitor. Some proceeded yet farther, and having revil'd him with most bitter Language, drove him with Stones from the Walls; upon which protesting his own Innocence, he charg'd his Grand-father with all the Calamities that were to follow, and march'd back with his Army to Selybria, a Town upon the Propontick, and from thence into Macedonia, where his Forces took in most of the strong Towns and Castles, together with the Wives, Children and Treasure of those who still con-

The Patriarch confin'd by the old Emperor.

Cantac.

tinu'd faithful to the old Emperor; they themselves shortly after falling into the same Hands, were confin'd to several Prisons in those Provinces. In the meantime the young Emperor, being advertis'd from his Friends in Thessalonica, that there wanted nothing but his Presence to reduce the City to his Obedience, the People being generally inclin'd to him, he march'd with great Expedition at the Head of such a Number of his Forces as he judg'd sufficient for his Purpose; and tho' he who commanded for the old Emperor did all he could to preserve the Place in its Obedience to him, yet he was hardly inform'd of his Approach, before his Friends beheld his Ensigns from the Walls, and forc'd those who were prepar'd to oppose him to retire into the Castle, out of which the young Emperor, who was immediately receiv'd into the City, drove 'em, after a very vigorous Resistance.

who is assisted by the Bulgari-
ans,

Παρά τὸν
Μέλανα
Πόταμόν.
Cantac.

This wonderful Progress in the young Emperor's Affairs exceedingly perplex'd his Grand-father, who once thought of courting his Grandson to a Peace, and was preparing his Ambassadors accordingly, when he receiv'd a Message from Michael, Prince of Bulgaria, with Offers of Aid against the young Emperor his Nephew, which Andronicus readily accepted, and the Matter was transacted with so much Secrecy, that the Management of it was entrusted to no more than two or three of his most experienc'd Friends and Confidents; notwithstanding which the young Prince had Intimation of it, and having defeated a Body of the Emperor's Forces near the River Melanes, he march'd in great haste towards Constantinople, to prevent, if possible, the coming of the Bulgarians: For he was upon just Grounds afraid, lest they, finding the City in a weak defenceless Condition, should either kill the old Emperor and seize it themselves, or, what he thought altogether as bad, should bring him so powerful an Assistance, as might enable his Grand-father to keep him out. He sent a Messenger with Letters to the old Emperor, in which he offer'd him

all

all imaginable Submission, told him how much Reason he had to fear those foreign Troops, and advis'd him to be cautious how he rely'd upon 'em, lest he put it into their Power to subvert the State, and attempt something prejudicial to both their Lives and Dignities. This Remonstrance came too late, for three thousand Bulgarian Horse-men were arriv'd, to the great Joy of Andronicus, who however remembering what he had formerly suffer'd from foreign Troops, admitted no more than the General and some of his Friends to come into the City, but quarter'd the rest in the Suburbs.

When the young Prince saw he could not prevail with the Emperor to dismiss 'em, he endeavour'd himself to draw 'em off, and prevail'd so effectually with his Presents to their General, that they inclin'd to his Proposals; and after their chief Officers had been magnificently entertain'd by him, they broke up, and return'd into their own Country. Cantacuzenus saith they were recall'd home by their Prince, who having been severely reprov'd by the young Emperor, for arming his Subjects against his Friend and Allie, and hearing that Prince's Army was under the Walls of Constantinople, issu'd out his Orders immediately for their Return.

A. D.
1328.

who depart
at the young Emperor's Sol-licitations,

The young Emperor, having thus remov'd the Bulgarians, was intent upon what other Measures he was to take, when two Watch-men of the City fled secretly to him, and undertook to betray it into his Hands, provided they receiv'd the Rewards they propos'd for their Encouragement; which being readily granted, and the Hour for the Performance perfix'd, they who were appointed to that Service provided themselves with Ladders of Ropes, which when the Time appointed came, the Traitors, having first made their Companions upon the Watch drunk, drew up about Midnight, and fasten'd to the Top of the Battlements, by which eighteen Soldiers, or rather more, according to Cantacuzenus, well arm'd mounted

and he takes Con-
stantino-
ple,

mounted the Wall, and broke open that which was call'd the Roman Gate, and so open'd an Entrance for the young Emperor, who instead of meeting with any Opposition from the Inhabitants, was with repeated Acclamations saluted Emperor. Tho' Gregoras his History appears no great Friend to the young Emperor, as having been bred up in his Grandfather's Court, yet upon this Occasion he highly commends his Moderation and Humanity; he tells us that the Prince, ascribing the Victory in the first place to God, gave strict Orders to all his Officers and Soldiers, at the Peril of their Lives, to abstain from violating in the least either by Word or Deed the Majesty of the old Emperor, his Grand-father: And when that unfortunate Prince made him a lamentable Speech, which favour'd more of the Calamities to which he was reduc'd, than the Greatness of Mind becoming an Emperor, he was so touch'd with it, that he hardly abstain'd from Tears; entring into the Palace he fell at his Feet, embrac'd him, and with Words full of Duty and Affection endeavour'd to comfort him. After this he went and return'd Thanks to God for his Success, and lodg'd in an Apartment near the Imperial Palace, quartering a small Part of his Army in the City, and commanding the rest to encamp without.

Androni-
cus III.

Andronicus, having in this manner render'd himself Master of the Imperial City, was universally obey'd as Emperor. His first Care was to redress those Disorders that had crept into the State during the Civil Wars, and to reward such as had suffer'd on his Account. He recall'd the Patriarch, whom his Grand-father had confin'd, to his former Dignity, and at the same time interceded with him in Behalf of those Ecclesiasticks who had join'd with the late Emperor against him; but the offended Prelate, who had so often injoin'd that Gospel Virtue of Forgiveness to others, found it a difficult Task to put it in Practice himself.

After

After this the Bulgarians began to threaten the Empire with a War, and having form'd a powerful Army made an Irruption into Thrace; and the Romans, on the other side, carry'd the War into Bulgaria, which was manag'd for some time with various Success; 'till both Parties at length grown weary, a Peace was once more establish'd between 'em.

Some time before this dy'd Othoman, the first King of the Turks, who laid the Foundation of the Turkish Empire in Bithynia, and is said never to have attempted any Town in vain but Nice and Philadelphia. The Domestick Quarrels among the Greeks in his time greatly contributed to his Success, tho' he was a wise, valiant, and generous Prince, but deceitful, designing, and ambitious. His Reign was long and glorious; he dy'd in the Year 1326, when he had liv'd sixty nine Years, and reign'd upwards of twenty eight. Beginning his Conquests with an handful of Vagabond Rebels, he subdu'd many Provinces in the lesser Asia, and several Sultans of his Nation, leaving his Son Orchanes Master of great Part of Cappadocia, and Bithynia, to which he afterwards added other Conquests of no less Consideration.

The Death of Othoman, first King of the Turks.

Othoman being dead, the Christians recover'd several Forts and Castles from the Turks in Asia, in which he had not Time to establish a regular Government before his Death. Of which when Orchanes was advertis'd, having secur'd to himself the Succession, and happily compos'd his Affairs at home, he march'd with his Forces against the Christians, and driving 'em out of their late Conquests, invested the City of Nice, for the Relief of which the Emperor pass'd over into Asia, and engaging with the Turks receiv'd a Defeat from 'em, and was himself wounded in the Foot, which prov'd afterwards the Occasion of a shameful Retreat. For Orchanes having in the late Engagement made Trial of the Christians Strength and Courage, left three hundred Horse to watch their Motions, whilst he retir'd farther into the Country with the rest of his Army,

The Christians defeated by the Turks.

A shameful Flight.

my, to seize on such Places from whence he might the better incommode the Enemy during their March. That Night the Emperor remov'd to a little Town near the Camp call'd Philocrene, there to be cured of his Wound; whereupon some of the old Emperor's Friends who were then in the Army confidently reported that he was fled, whilst others proceeded farther, and said he was dead of his Wound. At which the Soldiers, who thought themselves left as a Prey to the Turks, provided every Man for his own Safety; so that the three hundred Turks, perceiving the shameful Flight of the Christians in the Morning, possess'd themselves of their Camp, which some plunder'd, whilst others pursu'd their fugitive Enemies, and slew great Numbers of them, before they were able to convey themselves into any Place of Safety. The Emperor seeing his Army thus overthrown and broken, as by an invisible Power, took shipping, and return'd in great Anxiety to Constantinople. The Turks took all their Tents, many of their Horses, among whom were some belonging to the Emperor's own Stable, together with his Plate and other Furniture of great Value.

A. D.
1329.

Nice surpriz'd by
the Turks.

After this the Turks seiz'd on many of the Sea-port Towns in Bithynia, and rais'd Contributions from the whole Country, once more threatening the City of Nice, the Garrison of which Place the Emperor had upon his Departure promis'd to reinforce with a thousand Horse. When Orchanes was inform'd of this, he arm'd eight hundred of his own Horse after the manner of the Romans, and fetching a great Compass march'd 'em into the high Road that leads from Constantinople; at the same time he detach'd three hundred more, arm'd like Turks, whom he order'd to forage and destroy the Country as near as they could, and within View of the City, whilst he with the eight hundred Horse pursu'd 'em in an hostile manner, and put 'em to Flight, in sight of many of the Citizens, who from the Walls beheld the Action. When this was done they march'd directly to Nice, where they were were gladly receiv'd by the Inhabitants, who took 'em for Romans; but being got within the Gates, and in an Instant join'd by the other three hundred, who were return'd from their pretended Flight, they quickly kill'd the Garrison, and master'd the City.

The Imperial Ministers at Constantinople were about that time in too great a Confusion to find a Remedy for that unspeakable Misfortune. The young Emperor had been seiz'd with so violent a Fit of Sickness at Didymothicum, occasion'd by a great Cold he had taken in Bathing, that his Life was despair'd off, and all those who had been instrumental in the late Revolution consider'd with Horror the Condition they must be reduc'd to in case he dy'd, and the old Emperor was restor'd to his Power and Authority. The two Historians, Gregoras and Cantacuzenus, differ in nothing more throughout their Histories, than the Account they have given us of the Behaviour of those Ministers upon this Occasion. Gregoras saith, that Cantacuzenus and the other Favourites were so fearful of the old Emperor, tho' now grown Blind by Age and Misfortunes, for he had a long time mingled his Drink with Tears, and eaten the Bread of Sorrow, that they first thought of putting him to Death, and when they could not all agree upon that, they unanimously resolv'd to force the Habit upon him, and make him become Monk; and that nothing might be wanting to render their Persecution effectual, Synadenus, a Man of all others the most disagreeable to the aged Prince, was chosen to execute this their Will and Pleasure. Synadenus perform'd his Commission with the inexorable Cruelty they desir'd, and forc'd the unwilling Emperor at once to change his Condition and his Name, imposing upon him that of Anthony. On the other side Cantacuzenus saith, that the Emperor, fearing a severer Usage from his Prosecutors after the Death of his Nephew, voluntarily renounc'd the World, and took the Habit upon him; adding, That the young Emperor upon his Recovery

The young Emperor being in great Danger of Death,

his Grandfather is forc'd to turn Monk,

A. D.
1332.
and dies.

His Cha-
racter.

Recovery was much afflicted at it, as being desirous to restore the Imperial Authority to him, and that in the midst of his Sickness, when he despair'd of a Recovery, he earnestly desir'd to turn Monk himself; which if it be true, 'tis highly probable he was severely sensible of the notorious Injustice he had done his Grand-father, and thought, according to the Superstition of those Times, he might with more Impunity appear in that Habit before the last dreadful Tribunal. Whatever he design'd, he continu'd in the Empire, and his Grand-father dy'd not long after in a Monastery, in the seventy second, or as some will have it, in the seventy fourth Year of his Age, just so many Days after a famous Eclipse of the Sun, which happen'd the thirtieth of November before, but did not continue so many, as Gregoras would have us imagine, or rather as others have imagin'd for him. He was, in the Beginning of his Reign, a slothful unthinking Prince, by which he suffer'd the Turks to gain several Advantages over him; nor was he thoroughly awaken'd towards the latter End, tho' continually alarm'd by his Domestick Calamities, seldom or never appearing in any great Enterprize himself, but executing all by his Ministers and Lieutenants. The greatest Enemy he had was him whom he had nourish'd in his Bosom, and indulg'd with too much Excess. It is not easie to determine who was the most to be condemn'd, he or his Grand-son, since neither Gregoras nor Cantacuzenus can be consider'd as impartial disinterested Writers. Gregoras was miss-led by his blind Obedience to the first, and Cantacuzenus by his avow'd Friendship to the latter. Tho' after all, that Man who has any Sense of Duty or Loyalty must conclude, if the one was faulty, the other was inexcusable. Andronicus dy'd in the fifth Year of Philip the Fair of France, the nineteenth of Lewis the Bavarian Emperor in the West, and seventh of Edward the Third of England, A. D. 1332.

In the mean time the Turks pursu'd their Conquests in Asia, and the Emperor found himself so unable to contend with 'em, that by Cantacuzenus his Advice a Peace was concluded between the two Princes, by virtue of which the Turks were to remain in Possession of all their late Conquests, and leave to the Romans the peaceable Enjoyment of what they had not yet wrested from 'em. The Turks being by this means render'd Allies to the Empire, readily assisted Andronicus in the Recovery of Mytilene and Phocæa from the Genoese, who were by this time grown so powerful at Sea, as to dispute the Empire of it with the Romans.

Shortly after the Thessalians revolted, and took up so much of this Emperor's Time in the Reduction of them, that the Turks, who observ'd the Peace no longer than it conduc'd to their Interest, first made a Descent into Europe, with a Design to settle there, without being so warily observ'd as they ought to have been by Andronicus; so that during this Emperor's Reign, and that of his Son, they exceedingly enlarg'd their Conquests, and in time left the Emperor no more of the Dominions of his Ancestors than the City of Constantinople.

The Emperor was busy'd in these Commotions, and some Disputes in the Church, 'till the time of his Death, which happen'd in the thirteenth Year after the Expulsion of his Grand-father, the ninth after his Death, and forty fifth of his own Age, A. D. 1341. He was a Prince condemn'd by the generality of Historians of Ingratitude and Ambition, knowing better how to obtain an Empire by his Artifices, than govern it as he ought when obtain'd. However he is as much to be commended for his extraordinary Friendship to his faithful Servant and Counsellor Cantacuzenus, as he is worthily condemn'd for his unnatural Rebellion against his Grand-father, which in some measure may be owing, rather to the Instigation of others, than his own Inclinations. Tho' after the Death

Andronicus III. dies

A. D.

1341.

His Character.

Death of his Father he found himself unavoidably engag'd in the greatest Affairs of State, yet is he said to have been so much addicted to Hunting, and other Rural Exercises, that he constantly maintain'd no less than fifteen hundred Dogs, and above a thousand Hawks, for his own Recreations.

Phranz. 1.
I. C. 12.
John Pa-
leologus.

The late Emperor had two Sons by his last Wife Ann, the Eldest of which, call'd John, being at his Death little more than nine Years of Age, Cantacuzenus was declar'd his Guardian during his Minority, and Protector of the Empire; tho' much against the Will and Approbation of the Patriarch, who thought himself more worthy that honourable Charge, which gave occasion to many Factions in the Court, and introduc'd new Troubles in the Empire. The deceas'd Emperor being bury'd with the usual Solemnity, Cantacuzenus earnestly endeavour'd to restrain the great Officers within the Bounds of their Duty, and diligently provided for the Security of the Provinces: But he was in nothing more sedulous than his Court to the Empress, and his Care of the young Emperor and his Brother. Notwithstanding which the Patriarch, who was a proud ambitious Prelate, omitted no Opportunity of rendring him suspected to the Princess, and by that means study'd to make him weary of his Charge. He represented him as a Man of dangerous Designs, who had nothing less than the Imperial Dignity in view, at the same time that he pretended a profound Veneration for the Memory of the deceas'd Prince, and an entire Submission to the Empress and her Children. Cantacuzenus either thought the busie Patriarch would prove too great an Obstacle to his secret Designs, or was so sensibly offended at his unjust Calumnies, that he once thought of quitting the State, and retiring to a private Life; nor could the Empress reconcile him to the Court, 'till he had obtain'd a Promise from her, that for the future she would rest fully satisfy'd of his Integrity, and keep her Ears shut to the malicious Informations of his Enemies.

The Patriarch an Enemy to Cantacu-
zenus.

mies. This the Empress readily promis'd, tho' even then those two great Persons began to entertain mutual Distrusts of each other, which gave Birth to those Mischiefs which follow'd shortly after. For the Factions in Court increas'd every Day, and the Patriarch endeavour'd to foment the Divisions, by recommending such to the Empress's Favour and Service, as he knew were disaffected to Cantacuzenus, and would be ready on all Occasions to engage against him. These Persons continually alarm'd the Princess with the Dangers she was to apprehend from the Protector, how careful she ought to be of her own Safety and that of her Children, and with Tears conjur'd her to provide for their mutual Security ; till at length they wrought so powerfully upon her, who being a Woman was naturally timorous and distrustful, that in Cantacuzenus his Absence, who was then at Didymothicum, she order'd his Mother and some of his dearest Friends and Relations to be confin'd, and proceeded to a Confiscation of their Estates, behaving her self like one who look'd on Cantacuzenus as her mortal Enemy, and left no room for a Reconciliation. She first commanded him to resign his Office, which when he refus'd, she declar'd him an Enemy to the State, and proclaim'd him Traitor.

occasions of Civil War.

Cantacuzenus was highly incens'd at these Proceedings ; and perceiving his Enemies aim'd at nothing less than his Life, that a War was unavoidable, and that therefore he ought to provide for his own Defence, he listen'd to the Persuasions of those who told him he would do a great piece of Service to the Publick, and bring the War to a speedy Issue, if he suffer'd himself to be adorn'd with the Imperial Purple. He had at that time with him several Persons of the greatest Authority in the Empire, and saw himself at the Head of a powerful Army, which he had rais'd to chastise the Servians, who since the Death of the late Emperor had broken the Peace, and infested the Borders, and therefore made no doubt but he should be able able to maintain himself in that Dignity, to which his own Ambition did not so much invite him, as the Persecution of his Enemies forc'd him to assume.

Cantacuzenus declar'd Emperor.

When the News of this was brought to Constantinople, the Patriarch and his Adherents exceedingly valu'd themselves for their extraordinary Foresight. Cantacuzenus his Mother was committed to a more severe Restraint, his Estate was confiscated, and his Wealthy Substance apply'd to the Maintenance of that War which now became unavoidable. This is the Account Cantacuzenus has given us of this Affair himself, with which other Historians agree in Substance, and rather accuse his Enemies of that Usurpation, to which they forc'd him, than himself.

Cantacuzenus, having thus assum'd the Imperial Ornaments, endeavour'd to vindicate himself from the Aspersions of his Enemies, in a long Speech to the chief of the Nobility and Officers in the Army. He gave such Soldiers leave to depart as had their Families in the Towns and Cities subject to those against whom he was now engag'd in a War, lest they should be ill treated for his sake, and then proceeded to new model and form the rest of his Army, and prepare for his Defence. Adrianople was the first City in those Parts which refus'd to acknowledge him for Emperor, the Inhabitants of which Place, having laid hold on such as they knew were affected to him, sent 'em bound to Constantinople, and call'd the Bulgarians in to their Assistance; at whose Approach most of the Cities that had before declar'd for him shifted Parties, and sided with Palæologus, which prov'd of great Prejudice to his Affairs. Whereupon, the better to support himself, he enter'd into a Treaty with the Turks and Mysians, which prov'd of great Use to him in the Course of the War. And that nothing might be wanting to put a Stop to the Miseries of the State, he sent a Letter to John the Patriarch full of Christian Exhortations to Peace; but his Messenger was so ill receiv'd at Constantinople, that they threw

threw him into Prison, and kept so vigilant an Eye over the Empress, that she had not the Power left to accommodate Matters, tho' upon good Grounds she earnestly desir'd it. Having proceeded thus far, they Crown'd the young Emperor with great Pomp at Constantinople, and the Patriarch in a solemn Assembly excommunicated Cantacuzenus, and all his Adherents. Those of his Relations who had not the good Fortune to escape at the Beginning of the War were cruelly murder'd by Apocauchus, who had for a long time profess'd an Enmity to Cantacuzenus, for no other Reason but because he was a Man of greater Power, and better affected to the State than himself. This Man at first behav'd himself with some Moderation, but when he found the Breach widen'd, and the Faction confirm'd against Cantacuzenus, he then pull'd off the Mask, and appear'd the Head of the Party. That he might show the World what they were to expect from him, he us'd Cantacuzenus his Mother with the greatest Barbarity, tho' she was a Woman of Illustrious Birth, and as deserving as any of her Sex. He appointed her Keepers the most dissolute, and void of all Humanity, who were continually railing at her Son in her Hearing during the War; pretending sometimes an Account was brought that he was taken Prisoner, at others that an Express came with Advice of his being kill'd in Fight, that his Head was sent to Court, of which the Villains promis'd to make her a Present. Having by this Usage, and other Cruelties, thrown her into a violent Fever, Apocauchus would suffer no Physician to administer to her; and when the Empress hearing of the Danger she was in, order'd her own Physician to attend her, the Patriarch and his Accomplices, having first terrify'd him with bitter Menaces, made him solemnly swear he would prescribe nothing should do her any good. By these Practices the unhappy Lady dy'd shortly after for want of Help: Of which when the Empress was inform'd, and of the great Miseries she had

His Offers for a Peace rejected;

and the young Emperor crown'd at Constantinople.

A. D.

1350.

had undergone, she severely reprov'd 'em for their Barbarity, but had not the Power to resent it as she ought, for they govern'd all with an absolute Authority; and when by her repeated Importunities she would have forc'd 'em to send to Cantacuzenus, and make some Overtures for an Accommodation, they dispatch'd Creatures of their own, who returning, reported Cantacuzenus was so far from listning to any Terms for a Peace, that he had declar'd, if he prevail'd in the War he would punish the Empress and her Children indeed no farther than by putting 'em immediately to Death; but as for the Patriarch and his Associates, he would first have 'em whip'd like Vagabands round his Camp, and when he had loaden 'em with all the Indignities his Wrongs could suggest, he would then make 'em end their Days under most insufferable Torments. By this Device they were able to justify the War which they prosecuted with so much Vigour; and Apocauchus having made Andronicus and Thomas Palæologi Generals of the Land-Forces, at a prodigious Expence, mann'd out a Fleet of sixty Ships, the Command of which he took upon himself, and very much embarrass'd Cantacuzenus his Affairs, for he prevented his Reception into Thessalonica, where Cantacuzenus had a Party that endeavour'd to betray the Town into his Hands, and frighten'd others from expressing their Affections to him. After this the Zealots, for so our Author calls those that continu'd firm to the young Emperor Palæologus, prevail'd on every side, and Cantacuzenus was reduc'd to the last Extremity, and forc'd to fly to Crales, Prince of the lower Mysia for Aid, who receiv'd him with much Honour, admir'd him for the Greatness of his Soul, and Patience in his Calamities, and gave him the Assistance he desir'd; after which his Party recover'd Strength, and the Heads of the contrary Faction were greatly discourag'd; this made way for Proposals for a Peace, to which Cantacuzenas always declar'd himself well inclin'd, and once offer'd to quit quit the Imperial Purple upon such Conditions as they ought gladly to have embrac'd, had not their own Guilt and Enmity to him out-weigh'd all other Considerations.

Cantac.

After this he gain'd several other extraordinary Advantages over 'em, and grew in time so considerable, that Orchanes, the Turkish Sultan, desir'd his Daughter Orchanes the Turk marries Cantacuzenus his Daughter. in Marriage, to which after some Deliberation Cantacuzenus condescended, which ty'd the Turks firmer to his Service, and render'd him more terrible to his Enemies. In the mean time the Chief of the Zealots, perceiving they were unable to suppress him by open Force, had Recourse to Treachery, and prevail'd with Monomachus, a Constantinopolitan, who upon the Assurance of a considerable Reward undertook to Poison him. Accordingly he went to Cantacuzenus, lying then at Selybria, and with a feign'd Compunction confess'd what he had undertaken against him, but that being touch'd with the Horror of the Fact, he came to assure him his Life for the future should be as dear to him as his own; and to manifest the Truth of what he asserted, he produc'd the Poison he was to have administer'd to him. Cantacuzenus was highly pleas'd at the Freeness of his Confession, and gave him several rich Presents, to encourage him to be his Friend for the future. By this means Monomachus obtain'd such a degree of his Favour and Trust, that he had infallibly poison'd him with another Drug conceal'd for that purpose, had not Cantacuzenus his Friends at Constantinople privately advertis'd him of the Danger he was in.

Cantacuzenus having thus narrowly escap'd the Snare, was inform'd not long after that several of his Friends were contriving how to admit him into Constantinople, among whom were some of those who had join'd with the Zealots, and acted with the greatest Vigour against him, but perceiving the Heads of the Party had private sinister Designs in all they did, that they were no longer able to carry on the War effectually

A. D.
1347.

ally against Cantacuzenus, and yet would by no means be persuaded to embrace a Peace, they thought the readiest way to put an End to the Calamities of their Country, was to abolish the Authority of those Men, which would quickly determine if Cantacuzenus could be receiv'd for Emperor in Constantinople; for by this time most of the other Cities, which had not yet been conquer'd by the Turks, had submitted to him. Wherefore they dispatch'd a Person, who for his Experience and Fidelity was fit to be entrusted with a Business of that Moment, who inform'd Cantacuzenus of what was in agitation within the City for his Service, and instructed him how he was to assist his Friends, by a Conformity to their Designs without; and he, when he had been sufficiently instructed by that faithful Agent, broke up from Selybria, and retir'd to Adrianople, that those of the contrary Faction might have no Cause to suspect what was transacting among'em in his Behalf. It happen'd about the same time that the Zealots were at Variance among themselves, which may chiefly be attributed to the cruel imperious Humour of the Patriarch, by which he had disoblig'd the Empress her self, whose Zeal for the Peace and Welfare of the Church was upon all Occasions very remarkable, especially at this time, when several Disorders had crept into it, during these popular Tumults and Civil Combustions. Whereupon the Empress summon'd a Synod of Bishops, in order to enquire into the Patriarch's Conduct, and call him to an Account for his late illegal and tyrannical Proceedings against the Bishops and Monks. 'Twas in that Conjunction that the Empress was inform'd of Cantacuzenus his Designs upon the City, to which she gave little Credit, as conceiving 'twas only a Report rais'd by the Patriarch's Friends on purpose to defeat the Inquisition form'd against him. This contributed very much to Cantacuzenus his Admission, and he was receiv'd by his Friends at the Time appointed, who in the Night forc'd open one of the Gates, and, being shortly after join'd

Cantacuzenus receiv'd into Constantinople.

join'd by the Generality of the People, with an universal Shout saluted him Emperor. The Empress at first secur'd her self very strongly in the Palace, and refus'd to admit of any Accommodation, 'till the young Emperor himself, who had an Understanding uncommon to one of his Years, perceiving that they who pretended to be his Friends and Protectors disagreed among themselves, and that neither he nor his Mother could long be safe from the fury of the Mob, if they did not comply, earnestly entreated her to trust to the Generosity of Cantacuzenus, rather than expose her self to the incens'd Multitude; whereupon both sides came to an Agreement, by virtue of which Cantacuzenus was confirm'd Palæologus his Colleague in the Empire, and had the sole Administration of Affairs conferred upon him for ten Years, the young Emperor being then but fifteen Years of Age, after which he was to be equal in Authority with him. An Act of Oblivion pass'd on all sides, and they both agreed to be common Fathers of their People. A Peace concluded.

This happy Agreement put an end to a War which had rag'd for five Years within the Bowels of what remain'd to the Roman Empire, occasion'd the Loss of much Blood and Treasure, and gave the Turks an Opportunity in the mean time of settling themselves in Europe, and laid the Foundation of those unexpressible Calamities, with which all Christendom at length was visited.

Cantacuzenus, having been formerly crown'd at Adrianople, was again crown'd with much Solemnity by the Hands of Isidore, the new Patriarch of Constantinople. And to the end a perfect Union might be settled between him and the House of the Palæologi, he gave his Daughter Helena within a few Days after to the young Emperor, and order'd her to be Crown'd likewise. Tho' he did all that his long Experience and Conversation in the Affairs of State could suggest to him, for the Establishment of himself and his Family in the Authority, to which with so much Difficulty

The young Emperor marries Cantacuzenus his Daughter.

The young
Emperor persuaded to renew the War.

he had attain'd, yet the Cares of illegal Power fate heavy upon him, and at length entirely oppress'd him. During the late War he had been extraordinarily assist- ed by Orchanes the Turk, who had a high esteem for him, had marry'd one of his Daughters, and now came to visit him. This strict Alliance, and unusual Intimacy between two Princes of a different Faith, appear'd ve- ry scandalous to the Pope, and other Christian Prin- ces: At this Cantacuzenus was much concern'd, and by his Ambassadors sent to Clement VI. at that time Bishop of Rome, made so handsom an Excuse, show'd himself so ready to engage in a War against the Infidels, and willing to reconcile himself to the Romish Communion, that the Pope highly commended him, and seem'd en- tirely satisfy'd with his Conduct. About this time he fell dangerously ill at Didymothicum, and the Genoese of Galata, having frequently desir'd to enlarge their City, and been as often repuls'd, upon Suspicion that their chief Design was, under that Pretence, to se- cure themselves by a Wall, and defie the Emperor's Subjects, for whom they were already too strong at Sea, took this Opportunity, and having set Fire to several Buildings in the Suburbs of Constantinople, they seiz'd on all the Emperor's Ships that rode then in the Harbour; after which they gain'd several Advantages over him at Sea, and in the end prov'd the most dange- rous Enemies Cantacuzenus had to contend withal. For shortly after the young Emperor, who was retir'd with his Mother to Constantinople, began to listen to the Insi- nuations of those about him, who represented to him the insatiable Ambition of Cantacuzenus, who, having left him no more than the Name of Emperor, and usurp'd the Supream Power to himself, was now labouring to transmit it down to his Posterity. They bid him reflect on his pre- sent Condition, how he liv'd like an Exile, expos'd either to the Incursions of the Barbarians, who in a manner had all Thrace at their Devotions, or the Dangers of popular In- surrections. They advis'd him to remember he was an Em- peror, and to assert the Honour of his House; concluding that that the longer he sate patient under his Injuries, the more insupportable they would grow, and the less unable would he be to remove 'em.

These Men had undertaken this Office at the Instigation of Crales, who having broken the League concluded betwixt him and Cantacuzenus, had entertain'd an irreconcilable Aversion to him, and promis'd these his Pensioners in the young Emperor's Court liberal Rewards, if by their Artifices they could renew the War between the two Princes; and Palæologus, whose native Simplicity and incorrupted Innocence made him judge of other Mens Integrity by his own, was too easily seduc'd by their crafty Insinuations. The principal Actors in this Affair were Men who heretofore had profess'd an inviolable Friendship to Cantacuzenus, which obtain'd 'em the easier Credit with the young Emperor, who upon that Consideration highly applauded 'em for their Loyalty to him. This Disaffection in Palæologus broke out shortly after into an open War, which was not thoroughly extinguish'd, 'till the young Emperor, assisted by the Genoese, Cantacuzenus his inveterate Enemies, had forc'd his Father-in-Law to quit the Imperial Dignity, which he did generously, and retire into a Monastery at the Foot of the Mountain Athos, where he took the Habit, and liv'd for several Years remov'd from the Noise and Vexations of the World, leaving behind him the History of his own Times, yielding in Beauty to none of the modern Greeks; tho' having had so large a Share in the Affairs of that Age himself, it is not to be wonder'd at if sometimes he disguis'd the Truth.

Cantacuzenus turns Monk.

A. D.

1355.

He was undoubtredly a Man of a great Capacity, and unweary'd Application to publick Affairs, but had more of the Statesman than the Christian in him; as appears by his Alliance with the Turks, the profess'd Enemies to Christianity, who, according to the Historians of that Nation, first settled themselves in Europe during the Disputes between him and his Pupil Palæologus. He had a great Command over his Passions, and knew how to accommodate himself upon all Occasions. His Wars were many, and for the most part fortunate, tho' not always just and honourable. By his Writings it appears that he knew how to render himself considerable either in a publick or a private Life, and that he lost nothing of the Greatness of his Mind in his Retirement.

John Palæologus having thus remov'd his Competitor liberally rewarded the Genoese, who had been his great Friends and Confederates, marrying his Sister to Catalusius, or Gateluz, their General, and confirming 'em in the Possession of the Isle of Lesbos, to which they laid some Pretensions, and made good whatever else had been at first concerted and agreed between 'em.

The Turks
first Settlement in Europe.

About this time dy'd Orchanes, the second King of the Turks, whose Son Solyman, a generous, valiant Prince, laid the first Foundations of their future Empire in Europe, seizing first on Coiridocastron, a small Castle but strongly situated, and pursu'd his Designs with so good Success, that having spoil'd the Thracian Chersonese, he at length seiz'd on Gallipolis, which he garrison'd with a strong Body of Turks, who there form'd their Preparations for their future Conquests; but Solyman's Death, which happen'd not long after, hasten'd that of his Father, who dy'd in the Year 1356, and left his Son Amurath for his Successor, who passing with a strong Army over into Europe, and landing at Gallipolis, march'd from thence and took in most of the Towns of Consequence in that Part of Thrace, call'd at present Rumilia, and at length conquer'd Adrianople it self. Having thus with a prodigious Progress in a manner master'd all Thrace, he made Adrianople the Seat of his Empire in Europe, as the most proper for his farther Invasions, and the Enlargement of his Dominions. Palæologus, in the mean time, was so far from attempting to oppose this victorious Invader, that he was glad at last to receive a Peace from him, whilst Amurath in the Pride of his Prosperity consider'd the Greek Emperor as little other than his Vassal, as it appear'd pear'd at length by his Behaviour to him. For Andronicus, the Emperor's eldest Son, having contracted an intimate Friendship with Saux, one of Amurath's Sons, and being both impatient of Subjection, and ambitious above measure, they mutually conspir'd

 the Death of their Fathers, as the only Means to secure and hasten their own Advancement. When this was discover'd to Amurath, he, after diligent enquiry into the Matter, and plain Proof made against 'em, order'd his own Son's Eyes to be pluck'd out, and by Letters requir'd the Emperor to inflict the same Punishment on his Son, threatening if he refus'd, to oblige him to it by Force; with which the Emperor was so terrify'd, that he instantly obey'd, either for that he consider'd he was unable to withstand Amurath's Forces, and therefore thought it imprudent to provoke him; or that he was afraid of a War, which of Necessity would divert him from his usual Intemperance: For the Historian represents him as a Prince Ducas.
 stupid and unactive, applying all his Time to amorous Amusements, and glorying more in the Conquest of a beautiful Woman, than the Defence of his Subjects, and the Security of the State. Andronicus, together with his Son an Infant, being thus blinded by scalding Vinegar, was by the Emperor's Order thrown into Prison, where he continu'd for two Years, at the end of which he made his Escape, and by the Assistance, as some say, of Amurath himself, but more probably, according to others, of the Genoese in Gala- ta, he rais'd a War against his Father, whom he overthrew, and having forc'd his Way into Constantinople, caus'd himself to be proclaim'd Emperor, and threw
 his Father and two Brothers, Manuel and Theodorus, into Prison; where they likewise continu'd for two Years, and then found Means of escaping to Scutari:
 Of which when Andronicus was inform'd, that Prince, abhorring the Calamities of a Civil War, under which the Romans had so lately groan'd, and of which he would now be esteem'd the Author, sent for his Father,

Father, and having receiv'd from him an Oath for his own Security, restor'd him to his Throne, and retir'd with his Wife and Son to Selybria, where the Emperor suffer'd him to reside in Safety, and allow'd him a reasonable Revenue for his Maintenance. Others say Manuel, Andronicus his Brother, made his Escape to Bajazet, who had lately succeeded his Father, with whom he contracted to hold the Empire as tributary to him, provided he would expel his Brother, and confirm him in the Succession. This is contradicted as well by those who make Amurath to have receiv'd John Palæologus, as by Ducas, from whom we learn that he dy'd some time before him, and that Bajazet held so hard a Hand over him, and impos'd such dishonourable Conditions upon him, that the helpless Emperor, who had a long time been afflicted with the Gout, which his disorderly Life had brought upon him, dy'd thro' Grief, leaving no Son living behind him but Manuel, who was then in Bajazet's Court. The Truth is, the Accounts we have of the few following Emperors, and their Actions, are like the Words of dying Men, broken and imperfect, as if they sympathiz'd with the present Condition of the Empire, which began now to labour under its last Agonies.

The Death
of John Palæolo-
gus

A. D.
1387.

Manuel
Palæolo-
gus.

Constantinople besieged by Bajazet.

Manuel, hearing of his Father's Death, posted away immediately for Constantinople, without his taking Leave of Bajazet, or acquainting him with the Reasons that call'd him so hastily away: Of which when the Tyrant was inform'd, he severely punish'd those Officers that suffer'd him to escape, and passing with great Expedition out of Bitbynia into Thrace, he destroy'd all the Cities and Towns adjoining to Constantinople; and having over-ran all Thessaly, Macedon, and Bulgaria, he sat down before the Imperial City, which he closely besieg'd both by Sea and Land. This Torrent of Success provok'd the Christian Princes in the West to enter into a League against him, and Sigismund King of Hungary pass'd the Danube at the Head of more

more than one hundred and thirty thousand Men, and falling into the Turkish Dominions, recover'd Vidine, with other Places of Consequence in Bulgaria, after which they laid close Siege to Nicopolis. When Bajazet was inform'd of this, and the Danger Nicopolis was in, he instantly rais'd the Siege, and having join'd all his Forces, march'd with wonderful Expedition, and gave the Christians Battel, killing or taking Prisoners most of that numerous Army, and then return'd to renew the Siege of Constantinople. When he had lain before it for some time, and perceiv'd that tho' the Citizens labour'd under all the Difficulties which usually attend a Siege, they continu'd resolute to hold it out to the last, he hop'd to master the Town by sowing Sedition among the Inhabitants. John, the Son of Andronicus, of whom we had Occasion to make Mention before, still resided at Selybria, whom Bajazet thought a proper Instrument, if he could make him subservient to his Designs. Wherefore having enter'd into a private Agreement with him, he declar'd him Emperor, as being the Son of Andronicus, Manuel's Elder Brother, proposing to the Constantinopolitans, that provided they would drive Manuel out of the City, and receive his Nephew John, he would then withdraw his Army, and abstain from all Hostilities. This created a Division among the Inhabitants, who began to murmur and complain of the Hardships they suffer'd; which when Manuel observ'd, and that some demanded in high Terms for the Admission of John, he writ to his Nephew, being at that time in the Turkish Camp, and promis'd to open the Gates, and relinquish'd the Sovereignty to him, upon Condition he might have Liberty to depart with his Wife and two Sons, and be transported in a Vessel provided for that purpose to whatever Place he should think fit; for being a Prince of a tender compassionate Temper, he thought it prudent to give way to Necessity, and for the present ease his Subjects of the Calamities under which they groan'd, and leave the rest to Providence,

His Designs upon the City

dence, concluding that he might be better able to provide for the Safety of the City, which he saw ready to be devour'd by the Turks, in his Absence, than if he staid in Person to defend it. Wherefore having receiv'd the Security he expected from John, he resign'd the Imperial Crown to him, and departed first to Venice, and from thence to several other Courts in Europe, to solicit Aid against the Turks, whose growing Power began now to be a Terror to all Christendom.

John, among other Things, had agreed to resign Constantinople to Bajazet, in Consideration whereof he was to have Peloponnesus granted to him with an independent Authority, and a perpetual Peace was concluded between him and the Turks. When Manuel was departed, and Bajazet sent to demand a Performance of this Agreement from John, the Citizens of Constantinople, who had in the mean time receiv'd a seasonable Supply of Provisions and other Necessaries, absolutely refus'd to comply; whereupon Bajazet prepar'd to force 'em to a Submission, when he receiv'd Advice that Tamerlane, the victorious Tartarian, was threatening his Dominions in Asia with an Invasion. For the Princes of Asia, being provok'd at Bajazet's Cruelties, with which he had render'd himself detestable to all Mankind, apply'd themselves to Tamerlane for a Redress; and that Prince having conquer'd Parthia, and made all the East to tremble, turn'd his Arms against Bajazet, and was now breaking into Syria, which diverted the Tyrant from his intended Designs against Constantinople, and call'd him to the Security of his own Dominions. Wherefore transporting himself with all Expedition to Prusa, he there muster'd his Forces, which were drawn thither in prodigious Numbers, as well out of the East as West; with these he march'd against Tamerlane, who gave him Battel in the Plains of Angoria in Galatia, on Friday July 28, 1402. and having taken him Prisoner, led him through his Army on a Mule, as a Punishment for his excessive Pride, and then confin'd him like a wild Beast in a Cage, against which

A. D.
1402.

baffled by Tamerlane the Tartar,

who defeats
him.

which he dash'd his Brains out the Year following ; The Death of Bajazet.
 teaching all arrogant tyrannical Princes, how vainly they pride themselves in the Confidence of their own Strength, and how much the Hand of Fate is above 'em.

When Manuel the Emperor, who lay then at Me-thone, was inform'd of the Death of Bajazet, who fell sudden, as a Star seems to shoot from the Firmament, he remov'd from thence and return'd to Constantinople, where he was receiv'd with the universal Acclamations of the People, who being offended at John's servile Compliance with the Turks, thrust him from the Empire, and restor'd his Uncle.

Manuel, immediately upon his Restoration, hearing Tamerlane was coming to Prusa, the Seat Royal of the Othoman Princes in Asia, and Repository of their immense Treasures, the Spoils of almost half the Earth, he sent his Ambassadors to wait his coming, and in his Name to thank him for the mighty Deliverance he had receiv'd by his means, and offer'd to subject himself and all his Dominions to his Deliverer and Protector. Tamerlane at his Arrival receiv'd the Ambassadors very graciously, but refus'd the Present, declaring he came not so far to Conquer, but to Restore, and that he desir'd no other Reward for the Service he had the Happiness to do their Master, but to be remember'd with Honour for it by Posterity. After this these two Princes mutually visited each other at Prusa and Constantinople, where all the Expressions of Love, Friendship, Gratitude, and Respect pass'd between 'em.

This great Overthrow of the Turks had like to have produc'd a total Dissolution of their Kingdom, both The distracted Condition of the Turks Affairs.
 in Asia and Europe ; for besides those Provinces which fell into the Hands of Tamerlane and his Captains, the rest were dismember'd by several Competitors, who laid Claim to the Sovereignty ; and tho' Mahomet, the first of that Name, was at length acknowledg'd King, yet his other Brothers, the Sons of Bajazet, pretending separately an equal Right to what all would enjoy, the

the War was continu'd with great Fury between 'em for ten Years together, during which Manuel the Emperor had time to breathe, and give some Ease to his distemper'd State, and so wisely manag'd the Divisions between the Turks, that they made their Court by turns to him, and gave him several Advantages. And tho' Mahomet, after much Blood shed on all sides, and the Death of his Brothers, Isa, Solyman, and Musa, who lost their Lives in the Quarrel, made himself sole Monarch of the Turks, and at his Death left it to his Son Amurath; yet Manuel, assisted by other Princes of his Nation, supported an Impostor that call'd himself Mustapha the Son of Bajazet, who had been slain many Years before in the Wars with Tamerlane, by which means he was able to maintain his Quarrel for a considerable Time, and gave no small Trouble to Amurath; at which that haughty Prince was so provok'd, that having after much Difficulty suppress'd the Impostor, he in Revenge of the Affront laid close Siege to Constantinople; and the Emperor, to divert the Tyrant, in Conjunction with the King of Caramania, whose Sons had marry'd three of Amurath's Sisters, countenanc'd another Mustapha, surnam'd the Little, his younger Brother, who besieging Nice, took it, together with several other Places in Asia, whither Amurath was forc'd to pass over to oppose him.

The Death
of Manuel.

Shortly after this Manuel the Emperor dy'd, after a Reign of thirty Years, during which he had been Witness of many Revolutions, and struggled under a multitude of Difficulties, but at length enjoy'd a Tranquility, whilst his Neighbours were engag'd in Wars round about him. Towards the latter end of his Reign he was so broken with Age, that the Administration of publick Affairs was committed to his Son John, who succeeded him in the Empire.

His Character.

From the small Account left us of this Emperor, we find that he was patient in Adversity, and humble in Prosperity, exceeding grateful to his Friends, and no less generous to his Enemies whenever they fell into his his Power. He was both a prudent and politick Prince, and like a skilful Physician at least mitigated the Rigour of that Disease, which it was not in the Power of Art to cure. Some say he resign'd the Empire to his Son John Palæologus in 1419, and assuming the Name of Anthony, took upon him the Religious Habit, living in a Monastery 'till the Year 1425. Onuphr.

John VI. surnam'd Palæologus, found the Turks so powerful, that he was glad to accept of such a Peace as Amurath would condescend to give him: He not only quitted to him all the Towns lying upon the Pontic, Mesembria, Derci, and a few others which were able to withstand the Force of the Conqueror's Arms excepted, but engag'd to pay him a Tribute of three hundred thousand Aspers yearly; a great Price for the peaceable Enjoyment of the poor Remains of the Roman Empire, which now contain'd little more than Constantinople it self. John VI.

Manuel, the late Emperor, had two Sons besides John, the Elder of which was call'd Theodorus, who dy'd of the Plague, and the other Andronicus, whom he had made Governor or Despot of Theffalonica, to which Amurath laid Claim, as having been formerly conquer'd by Bajazet; after whose Death it relaps'd again to the former Proprietors; who perceiving they were not able to maintain it against the invincible Power of the Othomans, deliver'd it up to the Venetians, which occasion'd a long expensive War betwixt them and the Turks, 'till in the end Amurath took it by Storm, in the Year 1429, or 1431, having first promis'd his Soldiers the Spoil of that capacious City, and the Inhabitants, Men, Women, and Children, for their Slaves. A. D. 1431. Theffalonica taken by the Turks.

Nothing could exceed the Calamities of this City, but those that follow'd some Years after at Constantinople, which seem'd to be prefigur'd by these. The Holy Virgins, devoted to a Recluse Life, became subject to the Lust of the most libidinous Conquerors, and the noble Matrons fell a Prey to insolent Vagabonds, bonds, and undistinguish'd Slaves. The declar'd Enemies of Jesus Christ profan'd the Altar, robb'd the Churches of their sacred Ornaments, and blasphem'd God in the Sanctuary. Miseries 'till then unheard of, and not now to be express'd, fell like a Torrent upon the Head of a guilty impenitent People, whose obstinate Iniquities and daily Provocations had forc'd the Divine Vengeance down to overwhelm 'em. When Amurath had thus, with the Insolence of a victorious implacable Enemy, sacrific'd the miserable Inhabitants of Thessalonica to his brutish Barbarity, and repeopled it with Subjects of his own Nation, he return'd to Adrianople, where he gave Audience to the Venetian Ambassadors, who, weary of the War, and afraid lest he should in the end translate it into Eubæa, made Proposals for a Peace, recommended with such Concessions on their Parts that Amurath at length disdain'd not to condescend to it, tho' he instantly directed his restless Arms against other Christian Princes, by the Fertility of whose Countries he was allur'd, or enrag'd at their generous Love of Liberty.

A Peace
concluded betwixt
them and the Vene-
sians.

A. D.
1438.

This amazing Progress of the Turks gave John the Emperor great Reason to fear, that his petty Empire would at length become their Prey, unless he receiv'd timely Assistance from the Latins, in whom all his Hopes of Succours rested, which made him seriously desire the Union of the Greek and Latin Churches, as the only Means to effect it. Wherefore hearing a Council was to be celebrated at Ferrara, and being invited to it by Eugenius IV. Pope of Rome, he went thither in Person, attended by the Patriarch, the Clergy, and a long Train of Græcian Princes, and was magnificently receiv'd by the Western Princes. At Florence, to which, by reason of the Plague that rag'd at Ferrara, the Council was afterwards remov'd, the Union between the two Churches was effected, and subscrib'd to by the Patriarch and the rest of the Bishops, who gain'd more by it than the Emperor, for they had liberal Pensions allow'd 'em for their Support, whereas he receiv'd nothing but uncertain Promises of Assistance hereafter, and had little Reason to expect the Performance.

Upon his Return he found his People little satisfy'd with what had been done, especially when they heard that some of their Bishops refus'd to subscribe to the Decrees of their Council, 'till they had receiv'd the Money they had bargain'd for before-hand, by that means publickly prostituting their own Consciences, their Religion, and the Trust repos'd in 'em, for Gain. This Uneasiness in his Subjects, the Loss of his Empress Despina, who dy'd during his Absence in Italy, and the daily Encroachments of the Turks, were Calamities too insupportable to one already broken with Age and the Gout, and hasten'd him to his Grave, after he had reign'd twenty four Years, and beheld the unavoidable Ruin of the Empire gathering at a Distance, and like Waves in a tempestuous Sea rolling on with an impetuous Course, strengthening and enlarging it self in its Approach. Tho' most Authors agree upon the Time that he reign'd, yet they differ as to the Year in which he dy'd, some placing his Death in the Year 1444, or 45, and others in 1448. He left the Shadow of the Empire, and the Cares that attend it, to his Brother Constantine, but the Sub- stance was gone long before. His Dominions were almost included within the Walls of Constantinople, whither the Imperial Power and Authority retir'd, shining with a languid imperfect Light; as Life and Heat are driven frequently from the Members to the Head, of which at length they are dispossest'd by Death.

John the Emperor
dies.

Constanti-
nus Pa-
læologus.

Amurath, the Turkish Sultan, did not long survive the Emperor, but dying in the Year 1450, left his large Dominions to his eldest Son Mahomet, whose Mother being the Prince of Servia's Daughter, and a Christian, the Christians promis'd themselves at first mighty Advantages from the Death of Amurath, but quickly found how much their Hopes had deceiv'd 'em.

Amurath
dying is succeeded by Mahomet the Great.

'em ; for Mahomet outwardly profess'd the Superstitions of his Fathers, and declar'd himself an Enemy to Christianity, tho' in reality he was of no Religion at all, but derided the Simplicity of those who thought God concern'd himself with the Affairs of the World, and to give Mankind a terrible Instance of what they were to expect from him, he was no sooner confirm'd in the Throne, but he put his Brethren to Death. At first he enter'd into a League with the Emperor Constantine, but so soon as he had finish'd the Caramanian War, which detain'd him for some time in Asia, he then pass'd over into Europe ; and having built a Fort, call'd by the Greeks Næocastrum, opposite to another in Asia call'd Asprocastron, or the white Castle, by which means he had a perfect Command of those Streights, and was able to curb Constantinople, from whence this Castle was but five Miles distant, and interrupt the Trade which the Merchants of Venice, Genoa, and Constantinople drove at Corfu, he then thought it in his Power to take that City, so often attempted by his Predecessors, who after long Sieges had been forc'd to rise from it with Dishonour.

The Citizens of Constantinople were exceedingly concern'd at this Undertaking, conceiving, upon good grounds, that it was design'd for their Destruction ; wherefore the Emperor sent his Ambassadors to Mahomet to expostulate the Matter with him, to represent to him the Injustice of the Attempt, and if possible to divert him from it. But the arrogant Tyrant was so far from complying, that he threaten'd to pull his Skin over the Ears of any other that should be sent to him upon that Errand, and proceeded on in the Work, which in the Beginning of the Spring was finish'd ; after which he sent his Troops abroad, who scour'd the Country up to the very Gates of the City, which the Emperor by a provident Care had before supply'd with plenty of Provisions, and other Necessaries requisite to a Siege. And at the same time he sent to desire Aid from the Pope, and the

the other Christian Princes, who notwithstanding, miss-led by a strange Infatuation, suffer'd the City to become a Prey to the Turks, whilst they sat still as idle Spectators, or were wholly employ'd in petty Quarrels among themselves.

In the Beginning of the Year 1453, a Year fatally memorable to all Christendom, Mahomet march'd from Adrianople at the Head of three hundred thousand Men, Bulgarians, Servians, Macedonians, Germans, Bohemians, Hungarians, and even Greeks having list'd themselves under him; it being always the Policy of the Mahometan Princes to allure Christians to fight against their Brethren, and to turn their unnatural Arms against themselves. To these were added his effeminate Soldiers of Asia, his natural Turks and Fanizaries, in Number fewer, in Quality inferior, and yet they commanded all the rest. With this Army, well appointed with all warlike Provision, Mahomet came, and on the ninth of April encamp'd before Constantinople, covering with his numerous Troops all the main Land before the City, from the side of the Bosphorus to the Haven, which the River running far up into the Land, makes between Pera and Constantinople. The Asiatics were plac'd on the right Hand towards the Bosphorus; the Europeans lay on the left, extending to the Haven, and the Sultan himself was planted with fifteen thousand Fanizaries and other Guards over-against the Heart of the City, and in the Middle between both. His Admiral at the same time brought a Fleet consisting of thirty Gallies, two hundred small Ships, and other lesser Vessels mann'd with Turkish Archers, who were more for Shew than Service. The Emperor on the other side had no more than seven great Ships belonging to the Genoese, with three Cretan Gallies, as many from Venice, and two Galliot, and a few other small Vessels of Chios, all which came thither upon the Account of Trade, and by Chance rather than upon any design of Service, for which they were not well provided. Besides the Greeks

E e

arm'd

A. D.
1453.

Who lay Siege to Constantinople.

The Strength of the Besiege'd.

arm'd by the Emperor for the Defence of the City, he had entertain'd in his Service Joannes Justinianus, a Genoese Adventurer, who having been scouring those Seas, came about that time to Constantinople with two tall Ships, and four hundred bold, hardy, and experienc'd Soldiers. This Man, being of noble Descent, receiv'd a hearty Welcome from the Emperor, who made him Lieutenant-General of all his Forces, consisting of no more than six thousand Greeks, and three thousand Strangers, upon whose courageous Defence the Fate of his Empire depended.

The Progress of the Besiegers.

When Mahomet had assign'd each part of his Army their several Quarters, and had in a manner surroun- ded the City both by Sea and Land, he planted his Batteries as near the Walls as possible, and rais'd great Mounts in several Places as high as the Walls themselves, from whence the Defendants were sorely gaul'd by the Turkish Shot. He had in his Camp a piece of Ord'nance of a prodigious Size, drawn with much Difficulty by a hundred and fifty Yoke of Oxen from Adrianople, where it had been cast by an Hungarian Founder, who had formerly offer'd his Service to Constantine, from whom he met with so small Encouragement, that he fled over to Mahomet whilst he was busy'd in building his new Castle, who assign'd him so liberal a Pension, that for a quarter of it he would have continu'd firm in the Emperor's Service. With this vast Piece Mahomet terribly shook the Walls, and made such Breaches, that the Defendants, who omitted no part of their Duty, found it almost impossible to repair 'em. At the same time his Pioneers, directed by some fugitive Christians, had brought their Works to such Perfection, that part of the Wall and a great Tower standing upon it were entirely undermin'd, and there wanted nothing but the Tyrant's Direction for the blowing it up, when a German Captain call'd Grandis, a Man of great Experience in Services of that Nature, suspecting the Enemies Designs, wrought a Countermine, and sav'd the City for the present. This, and the vigorous Resistance of the Defendants, prolong'd the Siege, and threw the Tyrant into a great Rage, which was aggravated when he beheld from Shore his whole Fleet worsted by four Genoese Ships laden with Men and Ammunition from Chios, and one belonging to the Emperor, freighted with Corn from Sicily. The Turkish Admiral at the first sight of 'em was order'd to take 'em if possible, or at least to prevent their joining the rest of the Fleet which lay cross the Haven, over which the Emperor had drawn a Chain from Pera to Constantinople, and plac'd the Fleet within it for the Security of the Harbour: but the Turkish Gallies being low built, their Crew, when ever they boarded one of those tall Ships, fought with a mighty Disadvantage; for the Christians from on high thunder'd their Shot down upon 'em, and made a bloody havock among 'em. Mahomet all the while beheld the whole Action from ashore, and perceiving the unequal Fight, and prodigious Slaughter of his Men, he tore his Hair, blasphem'd God, and with a blind headstrong Fury rush'd into the Sea, as if the Waters were bound to bear him and his Horse to his Fleet, and he by his single Presence was able to turn the Fortune of the Day; 'till instructed better by his Danger, he turn'd back, and fill'd the Air with loud Outcries, and direful Execrations. At length his Fleet, weary and disabled, for they are said to have lost above ten thousand Men, retir'd with Dishonour, and all the Christian Ships, except one which was sunk, got safe into the Harbour; which when Mahomet perceiv'd to be so strongly defended, that he could not possibly force it, nor consequently assault the City on that side, he enter'd upon a bold extravagant Design, of which none but a Soul large as his own could be capable. For having commanded all the Wood from behind Pera to the Haven of Constantinople to be fell'd, and the Ways mended as well as the Nature of the Ground would admit, he contriv'd

The Turkish Fleet worsted by five Christian Ships.

Mahomet's insolent Rage.

who conveys 80 of his Ships 8 Miles over Land into the Haven.

triv'd certain Engines by the Assistance of a Renega-
do Christian, who had seen something like it practis'd before by the Venetians in the Lake of Benaco, with which he convey'd eighty of his Ships with all their Sails flying, to the Admiration of those who saw it over Land, the space of eight Miles into the Haven of Constantinople, where the Christian Gallies attempted to have burnt those Vessels as they were launching 'em; but Mahomet had before planted several Pieces of great Ord'nance for their Defence, with which he sunk the foremost of the Gallies, and forc'd the rest to retire. Having thus got Possession of the Haven, he caus'd a Bridge to be built over it with wonderful Labour and Expedition, by which means that part of his Army which lay encamp'd near Pera, could pass over to the Walls of Constantino- ple, and assault it on that side also.

The Behaviour of the be-sieg'd.

Duc. cap.
38.

In the mean time the City was not in more Danger
from her Enemies without, than her own Citizens, who were miserably divided with Factions within;
and 'tis wonderful to consider how far that unhappy
People were transported with a blind Zeal for Religion, at a time when they were furrounded with Dangers, and Destruction stood waiting at their Doors to devour 'em. The Disputes relating to the Union with the Latins were grown by this time so high, that some of principal Authority in the City made no scruple of declaring, that they had rather see a Turk's Turban, than a Cardinal's Cap at Constan- tinople; by that means sacrificing all that was dear to 'em, their Duty to their Country, their Interest, their Liberty, and that very Religion about which they with so much Heat contended, to their private Animosities, and ill-grounded Opinions: A strange Infatuation, and a manifest Token that God in his Displeasure had forsaken 'em.

During these Disputes and Contentions, the Auxiliary Soldiers mutiny'd for want of Pay, and the Inhabitants refus'd to go upon the Walls, declaring they had

had no Courage to fight against the Turks in the Breaches, whilst their Families starved at home for want of Sustenance. To remedy these two great Evils, after the poor Emperor had first with Tears in vain requested of his covetous Subjects to lend their Money for the Defence of the City, and they affirm'd with Oaths that they had none, but were reduc'd to extream Poverty for want of Trade, he was forc'd to convert the Plate and Jewels of the Church into Money to satisfy his Soldiers, and commanded a View to be taken of all the Corn in the City, which upon diligent Search was found in great Abundance in private Mens Hands, who conceal'd it on purpose to make an unreasonable Advantage of it; which however the Emperor now caus'd to be divided proportionably to every Family at a reasonable Price, and silenc'd the Complaints of the People, who were by that means supply'd with more than the Time allotted 'em by Fate would suffer 'em to consume.

For Mahomet having now prepar'd all Things necessary for a general Assault, the fatal Hour was approaching. The report of the great Preparations the Princes were making in the West for the Relief of the City, made it debated in a Council of War, whether the Siege was to be continu'd or rais'd. Some were of Opinion that the Army ought to break up and depart, without running the hazard of a Defeat from the Christians; but the Arguments of those who were for the Continuance of the Siege agreed best with Mahomet's Humour, whereupon the Day was appointed for a general Assault. Haly Bassa, who had formerly been Mahomet's Tutor, and was of the other Opinion, disdaining to have his Council rejected, and inwardly well inclin'd to the Christians, secretly advertis'd the Emperor of it; for which he was afterwards seiz'd by the Tyrant's Order, and carry'd in Bonds to Adrianople, where he was forc'd by exquisite Tortures to discover his Treasure, after which he was in his extream old Age put to Death.

*Mahomet
prepares for a general Storm.*

The Emperor, fore-warn'd by this friendly Admonition, first recommended the Care of himself and the City to the Divine Protection, and then appointed every Man to his Post, for the Defence of the Walls; but because the City was so large that all Parts could not equally be defended by so small a Number as were the Besieg'd, the greatest Strength was plac'd for the Defence of the outer Wall, where a considerable Breach had been made by the Piece of Ord'nance before-mention'd. This Justinian, with three hundred Genoese, and a select Body of Greeks, undertook to defend, and the Emperor himself, with another Body well arm'd, was posted near him. Here they lay all Night, waiting for the Time when the Assault was to be given, and hearing with Astonishment a great Noise in the Turkish Camp, who were making Preparations for it. Mahomet had some time before offer'd 'em a Peace, but upon such Terms as he knew they would not accept, which was done either to try if they had Courage to hold out to the last Extremity, or to justify all the Barbarities he was resolv'd to exercise against 'em, when he had master'd the City.

Justinian,
the Empe- ror's Ge-
ral, wound- ed, retires;

Early on the twenty ninth of May Mahomet detach'd a great Number of such as were least regarded by him to begin the Assault, who were design'd for no other purpose but to weary the Christians, before the Attack was begun by his more vigorous Assaultants, who were twice or thrice repuls'd by the Besieg'd, but with fresh Courage they renew'd the Assault. During the Conflict Justinian receiv'd a Wound in his Arm, at which when he perceiv'd he bled apace, he withdrew from his Charge, without leaving any to command in his room, and causing the Roman Gate to be open'd, which had been shut with the rest by the Emperor's Order, that his Soldiers, observing there was no Way left for 'em to escape, might fight with a more desperate Courage, he retir'd first into the City, and getting from thence to Pera he took Ship and sail'd to Chios, where where he finish'd his Life with more Ignominy, than he could have lost it with Honour under the Walls of Constantinople.

The Soldiers, dismay'd at their General's Retreat, and furiously assaulted by the Fanizaries, quitted their Posts in great Confusion, and fled too, striving to follow him in at the same Gate; whither they press'd in such great Multitudes that eight hundred of 'em were trodden under foot, among whom was the Emperor himself, who, perceiving that neither his Words or Example could remove the Panick Fear which had seiz'd his Soldiers, fled with the rest for Safety, and was press'd to Death.

In the mean time the Turks, being animated with the Flight of the Christians, advanced their Ensigns, and repeating with reiterated Shouts the joyful Sounds of Victory, rush'd in at the Breach, and like a Flood whose Fury had been long restrained, bore down all before 'em, killing such as came in their Way, whether they submitted, fled from 'em, or had the Courage to resist. For conceiving, by the vigorous Defence they had made, there had been many thousands more in the Place than there really were, they gave no Quarter, but fill'd the Streets with Blood and Horror. The Miseries that hereupon ensu'd were such as Eye hath not seen, nor Ear heard, neither has it enter'd into the Heart of Man to conceive, exceeding even those Jerusalem once felt, which are so lively represented by the disconsolate Prophet, and to which all other Descriptions would be infinitely Inferior. During the Heats which arose upon the Account of Religion, those who oppos'd a Conformity to the Romish Communion absented from the great Church, as disdain-<sup>Duc.</sup>ing to communicate with their Adversaries; but now their Fears drove 'em, whither their Charity could not before lead or invite 'em. They rush'd thither in promiscuous Crouds as to and occasions the Loss of the City.

an Asylum, but the Holy Sanctuary could afford no Protection to those, who had forsaken God, and for that Reason were forsaken by him; for they were all slain without Pity, except some few reserv'd by the barbarous Conquerors to Purposes more grievous than Death it self. Whilst some were busy'd in profaning the Churches, and with impious Hands tore down and defac'd their Holy Ornaments, others equally barbarous forc'd their miserable Captives, and with Torments 'till then uninvented, to discover the Treasures those unhappy Wretches had hid from the Emperor during the Siege, and which now appear'd so great that the Turks wonder'd at their Wealth, and at the same time derided their Folly, that possessing so much they bestow'd so little in Defence of themselves and their Country; and at this very Day, when a Man is observ'd to grow rich on a sudden, the Turks say by way of Proverb, He has been at the Sack of Constantinople.

The Death
of the Emperor.

Duc. cap.
29.

Some say the Emperor was not press'd to Death, but that he, being accompany'd with Theophilus Palæologus, Francis Comnenus, Demetrius Cantacuzenus, and the rest of the stoutest among the Nobility, did more than could be well expected of a Man, to oppose the Inundation of the Barbarians, 'till he was forc'd to yield to their infinite Number; and when he saw all his Companions kill'd, he cry'd out in a lamentable Tone, What, is there no Christian near me to cut off my Head? And that one of the Enemy, who did not know him, wounded him in the Face, whilst another came behind him, and struck him dead; and that Mahomet, to honour the Courage of so great a Prince, commanded that all the Funeral Honours due to Emperors should be paid him.

Thus dy'd Constantine Palæologus, the last Emperor of the Greeks in Constantinople, and had the unfortunate Honour of being accompany'd by the Empire in his Fall, all, after he had liv'd forty nine Years, and reign'd almost ten. He dy'd, as some of his Predecessors desir'd to die, in Action, fighting with his Sword in his Hand for the Defence of his Country; like a second Moses standing in the Gap, and endeavouring to avert the Divine Judgments from his People, but the Measure of their Iniquities was compleat, and the destroying Angel was sent out against 'em. To refer private Calamities to the Sins of those on whom they are inflicted is justly esteem'd bold and uncharitable, but when God's Judgments are discharg'd in general upon a whole Nation, when the Upright perish with the Wicked, and the Innocent with the Guilty, then it is lawful for us humbly to enquire what it was that forc'd the Divine Indignation down upon 'em, and to justify the Decrees of Providence; and sure the Greeks are equally an Instance to us of God's Mercies, and his Judgments. He had forborn 'em long, tho' they daily provok'd him by their Pride, their Impiety, and Uncharitableness; 'till at length he rais'd barbarous Nations up, who were first permitted to chastise, and when they still continu'd in their Impenitency, then were they at last commanded to destroy 'em. They who reason thus upon this Dissolution of the Constantinopolitan Empire, which has since prov'd so fatal to all Christendom, are more to be commended than those who ascribe it to Causes, which favour more of Human Policy, and derogate from the Respect due to Divine Providence. This great Revolution happen'd in the seventh Year of Nicholas the Fifth, Pope of Rome; the thirty second of Charles the Seventh of France, and thirty third of Henry the Sixth, King of England, A. D. 1453.

INDEX.

A

ÆTius an Eunuch, his ambitious Practices against Irene, p. 3.

Alacaseus his advantageous Stratagem, p. 235

Alexander, the Son of Basilus, succeeds Leo the Philosopher, p. 69. his degenerate Reign, 70. and Death, 71

Alexius Comnenus sent against Rufellius, p. 201. and suppresses him, 202. he commands against Bryennius, 205. whom he takes Prisoner, ibid. his Stratagem by which he defeats Basilacius, 207. revolts from the Emperor Nicephorus III, 209. and is declar'd Emperor by the Officers of the Army, 210. he takes Constantinople, 211. and deposes Botoniates, 212. his Actions against the Turks, 216. whom he forces to a Peace, ibid. defeated by Robert, 221. reduc'd to great Necessities, 222. his Artifice, 224. overthrown by the Scythians, 227. his great Victory over 'em, 228. his second War with the Turks, ibid. he again overthrows the Scythians, 235. his Behaviour to the Crusade, 243, & sequ. his Artifice, 256. his Death, 260. and Character, 261

Alexius II. a Child, left Emperor, p. 289. depos'd and strangled by Andronicus, 297

Alexius Angelus deposes his Brother Isaac, p. 314. his ominous Reception into the City, 315. his Aversion to publick Affairs, 317. his senseless Security, 321. flies from Constantinople, 325. solicits the Turks against his Son-in-Law Theodorus Lascaris, 337. who confines him to a Monastery, 338

Alexius, the Son of Isaac, releas'd by his Uncle, p. 340. flies into the West, 341. solicits the Latins for his Restoration, 342. and comes to their Army, 344. crown'd Emperor, 349. murder'd by Murtzuphle, 353

Alusianus a Bulgarian, his Fortunes, p. 166, & deinceps.

Andronicus his ambitious Designs, p. 276. marches towards Constantinople, 291. enters the City, 293. his Cruelties, 294. orders the Empress to be strangled, 296. declar'd Emperor, ibid. strangles Alexius, 297. his great Tyranny, 298. flies, and is apprehended, 301, 302. murder'd, 303. his Character, ibid.

Anna Comnena, Daughter of Alexius the Emperor, her Designs against her Brother John, 281. by whom she is pardon'd, 282

Annibal, the Carthaginian General, see Hannibal.

Antioch taken by the Crusade, p. 269

Assan, King of Bulgaria, p. 343. overthrows the Prince of Epire, 344

B

Baldwin, Earl of Flanders, chosen Emperor of Constantinople by the Latins, p. 335. besieges Adrianople, ib. and is cruelly put to Death, 336. his Character, 337

Baldwin II. succeeds Robert, Emperor of Constantinople, 346. solicits the Assistance of the Princes in the West, 348. his

- his great Security and Poverty*, 359. loses Constantinople, ibid. his Endeavours to have him restor'd, 364
- Barbarossa's Preparation for the Holy War, p. 308. obstructed by Isaacius Angelus, ibid. his Answer to Isaacius his Ambassadors, 309. his second Answer, 310. he forces Isaac to submit, 311
- Bardanes declar'd Emperor by the Army in the East, p. 6. his Eyes pluck'd out by Order of Nicephorus I, 7
- Bardas, Brother to the Empress Theodora, his Intrigues with the young Emperor Michael III, p. 42, 43. his great Authority, 44. created Cæsar, 45. murder'd 47
- Bardas Phocas usurps, p. 103. and is suppress'd, 104. declar'd General against Sclerus, 122. whom he overthrows, 124. proclaim'd Emperor by the Malecontents, 126. and dies of Poison, 129
- Bardas Sclerus usurps, p. 117. overthrows the Emperor's Forces, 119. his Generals defeated, 120. over reach'd by Manuel, the Emperor's Lieutenant, 122. beats Phocas, 123. overthrown, 124. imprison'd at Babylon, ibid. releas'd, and returns into the Empire, 127. imprison'd by Phocas, 129 set at Liberty, 130. and reconcil'd to the Emperor, ibid.
- Basilacius usurps, p. 206. defeated by Alexius, and taken Prisoner, 207, 208
- Basilus Macedo his Parentage, p. 47. declar'd Cæsar, ibid. murders the Emperor Michael, 48. breaks the Power of the Manichees, 49. his successful Stratagem, 50. addicted to Magick, 51. impos'd on by a Monk, ibid. his Death and Character, 53
- Basilus II succeeds John Zimisces, p. 116. enters Bulgaria, 125. but returns with dishonour, ibid. his Wars with the Bulgarians, 131. his Success, 133. he forces 'em to submit, 134. his Death and Character, 138
- Bohemond defeated at Sea by the Venetians, p. 219. joins with the other Princes in the Crusade, 238. in great Danger, 247. defeats the Turks, 248. his Practices with a Citizen of Antioch, 250. his Stratagem, 254. besieges Dyrrachium, 256. his Death and Character, 258
- Boniface, Marquis of Montferat, created King of Thessaly by the Latins, p. 335. takes Alexius the Usurper Prisoner, 337
- Branas usurps, p. 306. and is slain, 307
- Bryennius usurps in the East, p. 204. and is taken Prisoner, 205
- Bulgarians beaten by the Romans, p. 16. their Wars with the Empire, 56. beaten by the Hungarians, 57. invade the Empire 69. submit themselves to Basilus, 134

C

- Calo-Joannes succeeds his Father Alexius, p. 261. his Wars with the Turks, 263. and the Scythians, 264. his Conquests in Armenia, 265. his Reconciliation with his Brother and Sister, 262, 265. his Progress into the East, 267. wounded by a Boar, 268. his Speech before his Death, ibid. his Death and Character, 269
- Carbeas, a Manichee, revolts to the Saracens, p. 41
- Clizasthlan his Entertainment at Constantinople, p. 278. his treacherous dealing, 279. assisted by the Persians, 281. overthrows Manuel, 282. his Behaviour upon his Advantage, 284, 285
- Conrade, Emperor of Germany, undertakes the Crusade, p. 271. betray'd by Manuel Comnenus, 293
- Constantine VI, succeeds Alexander, p. 66. marries Romanus Lacopenus his Daughter, 73. suffers Romanus to be crown'd Emperor, 74. whom he procures to be remov'd, 82. by which means he is restor'd to his former Dignity, 83. poison'd by his Son, 87. his Character, ibid.

Constantine VII. succeeds Zimisces, with his Brother Basilus II, p. 116. his Management when sole Emperor, 139. his Death, 141

Constantinus Monomachus succeeds Michael V, p. 160. reduces Maniaces, 161. and overthrows the Russians. 162. and suppresses Tornicius, 164. his great Profuseness, 173. his Death, 177

Constantinus Ducas succeeds Isaacius Comnenus, p. 186. his Death and Character, 189

Constantinople besieged by the Latins, p. 322. burnt, 327. besieged a second time and taken, 330, 331. and plundered for a whole Day together, 332. taken by Mahomet, 423

Crusade, the Princes of it, p. 238. they besiege Nice, 245. and Antioch, 248. and take it, 250. they take Jerusalem, 253

Curiatii, see Horatii and Curiatii.

D

Dandolo, (Henry) Doge of Venice, his Character, p. 319. his Bravery, 323

Dolianus proclaim'd King of Hungary, p. 153. he is blinded, 156

E

Euphemius declar'd Emperor by the Saracens, p. 29. and is murder'd 30

Eustathius his desperate Attempt, p. 136. and Success, 137

G

Godfrey of Bulloign, one of the Princes in the first Crusade, p. 238. arrives with his Army at Philippopolis, 242. marches in an Hostile manner to Constantinople, 243. an Agreement betwixt him and the Emperor, 244

Guischard (Robert) his Expedition against Alexius, p. 217. besieges Dyrrachium, 219. his Resolution, 220. defeats the Emperor and takes the Town, 221. call'd into Italy, 222. his Death, 224

H

Henry, the second Emperor of the La-

tins in Constantinople, p. 336. his Death, 340

Hungarians defeat the Scythians, p. 188. destroy the Van of Peter the Hermit's Army. 240. assist the Servians, 276

I

Ibatzes the Bulgarian opposes Basilus II, p. 135. reduc'd by a Stratagem, 136

Jerusalem, taken by the the Christians, p. 253.

John the Eunuch, Brother to Michael the Paphlagonian, p. 147. his Behaviour, 150. and great Power, 151, 153. his Exactions, 155.

John, see Xiphilinus.

John, King of Bulgaria, assists the Greeks, p. 336. and puts Baldwin the Latin Emperor to Death, ibid.

John Ducas Vataces succeeds Lascaris at Nice, p. 340. crown'd Emperor, 342. his Success against the Latins, ibid. concludes a Peace with the Turks, 343. and enlarges his Dominions, 349. his Death and Character, 350

John de Brienne, titular King of Jerusalem, Guardian to the young Emperor Baldwin at Constantinople, 347. where he dies, 348

Irene offers her self in Marriage to Charles the Great, p. 3. depos'd and banish'd, 4, 5

Isaacus Comnenus declar'd Emperor by the Army, p. 181. defeats Stratioticus his Forces, 183. whom he forces to resign, 184. his Behaviour in the Empire, ibid. his Resignation and Character, 186

Isaacus Angelus takes Sanctuary, p. 300. crown'd Emperor, 301. he defeats the Sicilians, 304. his Forces defeated by the Cypriots, 305. his Behaviour to the German Emperor, 308. who forces him to submit, 311. his Neglect of State-Affairs, 312. depos'd by his Brother, 314. his Character, ibid. restor'd by the Latins, 325. his Death, 328

K

Kegenes, a Scythian, revolts to the Romans, p. 169. his Cruelty, 170. wounded, 171. and murder'd, 173

L

Leo IV. declar'd Emperor. p. 15. overthrows the Bulgarians, 16. opposes Image-Worship, 18. he is murder'd, 20

Leo V. in Danger of his Life through the Practices of a Monk, p. 52. succeeds his Father Basilus, 54. his Wars with the Bulgarians, 56. Conspiracies against him discover'd, 58. marries his Concubine Zoe, ibid. his causeless Jealousies, 62. his Death and Character, 63

Leo Tornicius usurps, p. 163. and is suppress'd, 164

M

Maniaces usurps, p. 161. and dies, 162

Manuel Comnenus succeeds his Father, p. 269. disoblige the People by his Administration, 271. his Treachery to the Western Princes, 272. his Wars with Roger, King of Sicily, 273. his Progress to Antioch, 277. his Behaviour towards the Turks, ibid. his Indiscretion, 281. which occasions the Loss of his Army, 282. his unexpected Deliverance, 284. his Negotiations in the West, 286. an ill Divine, 287. his Death and Character, 288

Manuel Palæologus Emperor, p. 408 besieg'd by Bajazet, 409. withdraws from Constantinople, 410. restor'd, 411. his Interviews with Berlane, ibid. his Death and Character, 412, 413

Michael I. succeeds Nicephorus, p. 12. and resigns, 15

Michael II. his Behaviour during the Reign of Leo IV, p. 19. who confines him, ibid. but is murder'd by him, 20. proclaim'd Emperor, 21. his Opinion in Matters of Religion, 22. his loose Life, 29. he dies, 30

Michael III. succeeds his Father Theophilus, p. 40. a degenerate Prince, 43.

his great Prodigality, 44. his Army overthrown by the Saracens, ibid. attacks his Uncle Bardas. Cæsar, 45. commands him to be murder'd, 47. and murder'd by Basilus, 48

Michael IV. marry'd to the Empress Zoe, p. 149. and is made Emperor, ibid. he quits the Empire, turns Monk, and dies, 157

Michael V. made Emperor, p. 157. deposes Zoe, 158. and is depos'd himself, 160

Michael VI. declar'd Successor to Theodoros, p. 178. his Behaviour, 180. raises an Army against Isaac Comnenus, 182. which is defeated, 183. whereupon he resigns, 184

Michael Ducas declar'd Emperor, p. 180. his Avarice gains him the Name Parapinaces, 202. he resigns, 203

Michael Palæologus, withdraws to the Turks, p. 351. recall'd, 352. aspir'd, 355. declar'd Protector of the Empire, ibid. and is crown'd Emperor, 356. removes with his Court to Constantinople, 360. which he repeoples with Greek Inhabitants, 361. he plucks out John the young Emperor's Eyes, 362. for which he is excommunicated by the Patriarch, 363. the Troubles that ensu'd thereupon, 364. his Innovations in Religion, and Persecutions, ibid. excommunicated by the Pope, 365. his Death and Character, 366

Murtzuphle his treacherous Design, p. 328. murders the young Emperor, 329. and flies 332

Mus, see Decius Mus.

Muzalo left Guardian to the young Emperor John, p. 353. envy'd by the Emperor, ibid. and is murder'd, 355

N

Nice besieg'd by the Christians, p. 245. surrender'd to Alexius, 246

Nicephorus declares against the Empress Irene, p. 4. declared Emperor, 5. overthrown by the Arabians, 7. slain in Bulgaria, 11

phorus the Patriarch banish'd by Emperor Leo, p. 18
phorus Callanicus his Exploits against the Saracens, p. 89. triumphs Constantinople, 91. saluted Emperor in the East, 92. crown'd at Constantinople, ibid. his Expedition, 94. Behaviour at home, 96. slain by
niscus, 98. his Character, ibid.
cephorus Botoniates assisted by the
uks, p. 203. acknowledg'd Emperor,
4. depos'd, 210

P

rianus his Answer to Alexius, p. 9
, the Hermit, the occasion of the 1st Crusade, p. 236- his unfortunate
pedition, 238. and unhappy Conduct,
9, he arrives at Constantinople,
10. passes the Straits, 241. and loses
s Army, 242
eius, see Afranius.
p, the German Emperor, engages the inces of the Crusade to assist his Bro-
er Alexius, p. 318
as defeated by the Bulgarians, p. 70.
clar'd a Traitor, 73. and is blinded,
t
cas, see Bardas.
hus, an Antiochian, betrays the City
the Christians, p. 267

R

er, King of Sicily, his Wars with lanuel the Greek Emperor, p. 273
nanus Lacopenus Admiral of the oman Navy, p. 71. crown'd Empe-
r, 74. his Speech to the King of Bul-
aria, 76. depos'd by his own Sons, 82
nanus, the Son of Constantine VI. is Practices against his Father, p. 86. whom he succeeds in the Empire, 88. is Death, 90
nanus II. his first Actions, p. 141.
is Expedition against the Saracens,
43. his great Severity, 145. poison'd
y the Empress Zoe, and stifled in a ath, 148, 149. his Character, 149
nanus Diogenes marries the Empress

Eudocia, p. 192. his Success against the Turks, ibid. new models the Ar- my, 194. rejects the Peace offer'd by the Turks, 195. defeated and taken Prisoner, 196. his miserable End,
198

S

Samonas a Saracen, Favourite to Leo V. his cunning Intrigues, p. 60. his Dis- grace, 63
Saracens, invade the Empire, p. 7.
their Success, 8. settle in Crete, 29. overthrow the Romans, 44. driven
out of Crete, 49. their Fleet destroy'd, 50. defeat the Romans in Sicily, 93. lose their Fleet, 95. Antioch recover'd from 'em, ibid. defeated before the Town, 100. revolt, 142. their De- sign upon Edessa prevented, 152. con-
quer'd by the Turks in Persia, 165
Scythians break into the Empire, p. 169. their Wars, 171, 225. defeated by the Hungarians, 188. overthrown by A- lexius, 228. they renew the War, 233.
and are overthrown, 235
Sicilians their great Cruelties at Thes- salonica, p. 299. defeated by the Em- peror Isaac Angelus, 304
Stauratius, Nicephorus his Son, crown'd
Emperor, p. 7. marry'd to Theopha-
nia, 9. forsakes the Palace, and turns
Monk, 12, 13
Stephen, Romanus Lacopenus his Son,
deposes his Father, p. 82. and is him- self de' s'd, 83

T

Tarlipix declar'd Sultan of the Turks
in Persia, p. 165. his Actions, 168, & dein.
Teichomere his tragical Story, p. 154
Theodorus appointed Tutor to the young
Emperor Michael III, p. 40. by whose
Order he is put to Death, 42
Theodora, the Daughter of Constan- tine VII. declar'd Empress together
with her Sister Zoe, p. 159. is sole Empress, 177. her Management and
Death, 177, 178

Theodora,

Theodora, Theophilus the Emperor's Widow, Regent during her Son's Minority, p. 40. who forces her from Court, 43
Theodorus, a Monk, his dangerous Craft p. 52. his Punishment, 54
Theodorus Comnenus, Prince of Epire, his Actions, p. 338, &c.
Theodorus Lascaris, Emperor of the Greeks in Nice, p. 334. his Actions, 336. appoints his Successor, 338. his Death and Character, 340
Theodorus Lascaris II. the Son of John Ducas, succeeds his Father in the Empire at Nice, p. 351. his Death, 353
Theophilus succeeds his Father Michael II, p. 31. revenges the Emperor Leo's Murder, ibid. in great Danger, 33. his causeless Jealousies, 34. his Death, 39. his Saying before his Death, and his Character, 40
Theophobus his Birth and Character, p. 32. declar'd Emperor by the mutinous Persians, 36. murder'd by the Emperor Theophilus his Order, 40
Turks conquer Persia, p. 165. defeated by the Romans, 167. their Success in Iberia, 174. their Incursions into the Empire, 190. their Offers for a Peace rejected, 195. defeat the Romans, 199. an Agreement among themselves fatal to the Christians, 200. conclude a Peace

with the Emperor Alexius, 216. defeated by the Crusade, 248. ten thousand slain by the Christians at Smyrna, 252. become tributary to the Tartars, 352. first call'd into Europe, 372. where they destroy the Emperor's Provinces, 373. overthrown, 375. defeat the Christians, 391. surprize Nice, 392. their first Settlement in Europe, 406. they take Theffalonica, 413. besiege Constantinople, 417. which they take, 423

X

Xiphilinus (John) Patriarch of Constantinople, over-reach'd by an Eunuch, p. 191, 192

Z

Zimisces, his Success against the Saracens, p. 93. aspires to the Empire, 97. crown'd, 100. his Expedition, 105. his Success, ibid. &c. his Triumph at Constantinople, 113. poison'd, 115

Zoe, a great Beauty, marry'd to the Emperor Leo V, p. 59. banish'd from Court, 66. recall'd, 67. remov'd from the Government, 72. and forc'd into a Monastery, 74

Zoe, Daughter of Constantine VII. marry'd to Romanus II, p. 141. whom she poisons, 148. depos'd by Michael V, 158. restor'd, 159. marry'd to Constantine VIII, 161. her Death, 176

m